is to merely numerical subdivisions of the force" (Thenius). The final words of ver. 8: And be ye with the king as he goeth out and as he cometh in, belong to the directions which Jehoiada gave for the division of the numbers and of the functions of the soldiers for this especial case. They cannot, therefore, be taken as of general signification, referring to all the life of the king, under all circumstances: "In all his business, or, in all his movements" (Keil), as in Deut. xxviii. 6; xxxi. 2. but they refer to the execution of this plan, and are to be understood of the movement of the king from the temple to the palace (Thenius). In ver. 9 sq. follows the actual execution of the commands of Jehoiada which have been imparted in the preceding verses.

Ver. 10. And to the captains over hundreds did the priest give, &c. Instead of the sing. הַחֲנִית, the Chronicler has the plural הַחֲנִיתִים, and all the ancient versions present the plural in the verse before us. It seems that it stood originally הַחֲנִיתָת (Isai. ii. 4; Micah iv. 3), and the last ת was lost by an error in copying (Keil). We must understand that these were not David's own weapons, but some which he had captured, and placed in the temple as an offering. According to Kwald, whose opinion Thenius approves, Jehoiada gave these weapons to the captains, "in order to begin and consecrate the enterprise on which they were about to enter, of restoring the family of David to the throne, by using the weapons of the great ancestor of that family." But perhaps his only reason for distributing these arms among them was, that those who had retired from service at the palace had left their weapons there. The centurions divided these weapons among their soldiers, as ver. 11 expressly mentions, among the "runners," not, therefore, among levites. When the men were thus armed, they were stationed: "From the right-hand side of the house to the left-hand side of the house, along towards the altar and the temple," so that they surrounded and covered the person of the king. The meaning is that they shut off the space from the temple-building proper to the altar, and that the king stood in the midst of this space. Whether one row stood across the front from side to side, and two others parallel, along the side (Bertheau), or whether one row stood from the right-hand corner of the temple to the altar, and the other from the altar to the left-hand corner (Thenius), must be left undecided. Not until after the troops had been thus arranged, did Jehoiada lead out the young prince into the midst of the open space (ver. 12). הַעֲרֹתָא does not mean the insignia regia (Clericus), or the phylacteries (Deut. vi. 8, Grotius), but, the Law, and, if not the whole Pentateuch, at least the Decalogue, which is so often called the "Testimony" (Ex. xxv. 21; xvi. 34, &c.). This was probably given into his hands as a symbol of what is declared to be the law for the king in Deut. xvii. 19, whereas the diadem was placed upon his head (2 Sam. i. 10). He was then anointed (1 Kings i. 39). To clap the hands was a sign of delight and approval (Isai. lv. 12). Besides the armed force, the priests, and the levites, a multitude of people was also present (ver. 14), which denotes that the coronation took place on a feast-day, when the people collected in Jerusalem from all parts of the country. The acclamations of the people are in the same words as in 1 Kings i. 25.

Ver. 13. And when Athaliah heard the noise, &c. As worshipper of Baal, who, at that time, had his own temple in Jerusalem (ver. 18), Athaliah took no part in the feasts of the worshippers of Jehovah, in the Jehovah-temple, and, on this day, she paid the less heed to what was going on in the temple, inasmuch as the change of the guards in the palace had taken place as usual, and nothing indicated any unusual disturbance. The great outcry, which she either heard herself, as she well might in view of the short distance from the palace to the temple, or which was reported to her by her attendants, aroused her suspicions, so that she betook herself thither. Josephus states that she went out of the palace with her own troops (μετὰ τῆς ἰδίας στρατίας), and that, when she came to the temple, the priests allowed her to enter, but the guards prevented her guards from following; that Athaliah, when she saw the crowned boy, cried out, and commanded that he who had dared to try to usurp her authority should be put to death, and that thereupon Jehoiada gave orders that she should be led out and executed outside of the temple. [That the queen should have gone down in person into the temple, without guards or attendants, to quell what must have appeared to be a mere vulgar riot, is certainly an astonishing incident.—W. G. S.] The words הָרָצִין הָעָם cannot be translated: "Of the people who flocked to the spot" (Luther, after the Vulg.). "The text must have read originally הָרָצִין הָעָם, and the ו must have fallen out by a copyist's error" (Thenius, Keil). The Chronicler transposes the words:

הָעָם הָרָצִין, and adds: וְהַמְהִלִּים אֶת-דָּוִד בֶּן-יִשְׁכָּרְבָל, i. e.,

the people who were flocking together and hailing the king. The רָצִים are, however, in this context, always the "runners" who formed a part of the royal guards (vers. 4, 6, 11, 19), so that the word can mean nothing else in ver. 13, and the text of the Chronicles cannot, with any good reason at all, be preferred.—Ver. 14. The king stood עָל־הַעֲמֹד, i. e., not "at the column" (Luther) [or, "by a pillar" (E. V.)], but at the appointed, traditional place, which was reserved for the king, by established usage (עֲמֻדָּה), as in chap. xxiii. 3; 2

Chron. xxxiv. 31. Thenius understands by it "the top step of the stairs which led up to the temple," but this would not be any especial position, because the priests passed and stood there every day. Evidently a particular place is meant, an elevated dais or platform (Vulg.: tribunal), which was reserved for the king alone, for, when Athaliah saw the prince standing there, she knew at once what the transaction was which was being accomplished. The people, who stood in the fore-court, could not have seen the king, if he had stood on the top of the temple-steps, on account of the altar ten cubits high which stood in the court of the priests. The platform in question must have stood before the altar, at the entrance to the inner fore-court (פְּתִיחַ 2 Chron. xxiii. 13), so that the king, when he stood upon it, was the first object to strike the eye of Athaliah as she entered. Solomon had caused just such arrangements to be made (2 Chron. vi. 13; see Exeg. on 1 Kings viii. 22).—The Vulg. incorrectly renders הַשָּׂרִים by cantores, the Sept. by οἱ ψαλλοί, and Luther by "singers," as if the word were הַשָּׂרִים. They are the centurions, as in vers. 4 and 9. The word is correctly translated in the Sept. and Vulg. versions of Chronicles by οἱ ἀρχοντες, and principes.—

הַחֲצֹצְרוֹת, trumpets, for trumpeters. Since the word occurs in chap. xii. 14, in the enumeration of the utensils of the temple, and is also used in Numb. x. 2 to designate the trumpets or horns of the priests, and since, moreover, 1 Chron. xv. 24

(xiii. 8), the priests appear as חֲצֹצְרוֹת, we can think here only of levites or priests as the persons who were blowing the trumpets.—And all the people of the land, i. e., "the multitude which was present" (Bertheau), as in ver. 13, not, "the entire force of militia, which was present in Jerusalem" (Thenius).—Athaliah rent her clothes, not so much in grief as from terror, like Joram, chap. vi. 30.

Ver. 15. But Jehoiada the priest commanded, &c. The centurions of the life-guard are here designated as commanders of the army in general. "The readers are to be reminded by this addition that the military forces were willing to obey Jehoiada" (Bertheau).—Have her forth through

(or between) the ranks, לְפָנֶיהָ, i. e., within the ranks, "so that she was led through the ranks, and was hindered from taking any measures in accord with her adherents" (Bertheau). Any one who might desire to take her part, or to assist her, was to be slain.—יָשִׁיבוּ לָהּ יָדֶיהָ (ver. 16), i. e., not, as Luther [and the E. V.] translate, following the Sept. (ἐπέβαλον αὐτῇ χεῖρας), and the Vulg. (imposuerunt ei manus), "They laid hands on her," but, as the Chaldee version renders it, and as almost all the expositors understand it: "They made for her two sides," i. e., they made room for her, opening the ranks on both sides, "formed in rank and escorted her out" (Keil). By מִבְּתוֹ הַפְּתִיחַ, the entrance-way for horses into the royal stables is to be understood, so that it is not the "horse-gate" (Nehem. iii. 28), as Josephus understands, for this was a gate of the inner city, and led into the city, not into the palace. She was not to be conducted by the way into the palace, because the new king was to make his solemn entry into the palace by this. It does not follow, however, that Athaliah was "to die shamefully and disgracefully by the stables" (Thenius), for the royal stables were not, as such, a shameful or unclean place.

Ver. 17. And Jehoiada made the covenant, &c. Not a covenant (Luther), but the covenant, i. e., the covenant of Jehovah with Israel, which had been broken by the false worship of Jehoram, Ahaziah, and Athaliah. This covenant was solemnly renewed. It attached primarily to the relation between the king and people on the one hand, and Jehovah on the other (they were to be Jehovah's people and belong to Him, Deut. iv. 28), then, also, to the relation between the king and the people. The people was to be, from that time on, once more the people of God; it was to worship and serve Him alone. The king was to rule according to the "testimony," i. e., the Law of Jehovah, which had been solemnly put into his hands, and the people were to be loyal to the legitimate king of the family of David. The immediate and necessary consequence of this renewal of the covenant was the destruction of the temple of Baal, with its altars and idols (ver. 18). When and by whom this temple was built is nowhere stated. It is most probable that it was erected by Jehoram, under the influence of Athaliah (chap. viii. 18), as the one in Samaria was built by Ahab, under the influence of Jezebel (1 Kings xvi. 32). Thenius is wrong in inferring from 2 Chron. xxiv. 7, that this temple was erected "in the enclosure of the temple of Jehovah," for that passage says only that Athaliah and her sons had plundered the Jehovah-temple of all which they could use in the worship of Baal. There can be no doubt that we must understand it to refer to a building on another elevation. It is certain also that Mattan, the priest of Baal who was slain, did not perform his functions in the same place with Jehoiada. [The grounds which lead Bähr to believe that the temple of Baal was not on Mount Moriah are not satisfactory. Every indication which we have in regard to it goes to show that it was there. Mount Moriah is just the spot which would have been chosen for the site of a temple by any nation of ancient times which might have lived at Jerusalem. There was no other elevation near or convenient. The "old city" was perhaps in some places a little higher than Mount Moriah, but it presented no sharp and clear elevation, such as those which ancient nations always chose as sites of temples, if there was one in the neighborhood. The other hills were too far away. It would be little in accord with the character of Athaliah to suppose that she gave up the best site, which was, at the same time, one of the grandest in the world, according to the taste in those matters, to the Jehovah-religion, and sought another for her own favorite deities. The Jehovah-religion may have been strong enough in Judah to force a compromise, and maintain a joint possession of the mountain. 2 Chron. xxiv. 7 says that Athaliah and her sons had "broken down" or

"torn down (הָרַסוּ) the house of God." Just how much that means we cannot perhaps determine, but the temple was standing and available for worship, &c., at this time, as we see, and it may well be meant that they broke down such portions of the walls of the courts, &c., as was necessary to get room for the temple of Baal. See also chap. xii. 5 (Exeg.) and 2 Chron. xxiv. 7. Still farther, if ver. 18 is in its proper chronological position before ver. 19, and is not, as Thenius thinks, to be taken as belonging after it in order of time, then it gives a strong ground for believing that the temple of Baal was on Mount Moriah. They stayed to tear it down before they formed the procession, and left the temple-mountain to "go down" and escort the king into the palace. It cannot be regarded, therefore, as "beyond doubt" that Mattan and Jehoiada did not perform their functions in the same place. That the latter did not like the juxtaposition, we may well believe, but if the question was whether to share Mount Moriah with the worshippers of Baal, or to remove the Jehovah-worship from it, or to give up the Jehovah-worship altogether, we may easily imagine what course he would have chosen.—W. G. S.]—Duncker, whom Weber again follows, deduces from the sentence: The priests appointed פָּקִידִים over the house of the Lord, the arbitrary conclusion that, in spite of the victory of the priestly party, "Nevertheless the number of the servants of Baal was so great, and their courage was so little broken, that it was necessary to protect the temple of Jehovah against their attacks by especial guards." Thenius also thinks that there is reference here to a kind of temple-officers which had not existed before, "by whom a new desecration of the temple by the worship of false gods was to be prevented." We must understand by it, as is expressly stated 2 Chron. xxiii. 18, the overseers who were appointed by David (1 Chron. xxv.), and who, during the time that idolatry prevailed, had not been regularly kept up, or perhaps had not been appointed at all. That the article is wanting cannot be decisive to the contrary. [So Keil. Ewald, Thenius, and Bunsen, on the contrary, think that they were intended to protect the temple against the attacks of the heathen. The Chronicler develops this short note into an elaborate statement, as he does all the notices of the origin of any ritual formalities or hierarchical organizations. It is not clear, however, that it should have been thought necessary, just at the time when the Jehovah-religion could once more count on the support of the throne, to appoint new and permanent officers to protect the temple from heathen attacks and desecrations. Moreover, this clause, thus understood, makes the position of ver. 18 before ver. 19 probably incorrect as regards the order of time. Shall we understand that they stayed to appoint temple-officers before completing the inauguration of the king? It would be most reasonable to understand it to state simply that they appointed a guard to stay and protect the temple from any sudden attack of the enraged worshippers of Baal, while all the rest went to escort the king into the palace, and see him mount the throne.—W. G. S.] According to ver. 19, the centurions mentioned in ver. 4, with their troops, the life-guards and the runners, escorted the king down (וַיֵּרֶד) from the House of Jehovah in a solemn procession arranged (וַיִּקְרָא) by the priest Jehoiada. Escorted him down, it is said, because there was a ravine between Mount Moriah and Mount Zion, over which at that time there probably was no bridge. They came through the "Gate of the Runners" (the Chronicler gives בְּתוֹךְ instead of בֵּין, by way of explanation) into the palace, where the throne stood, upon which the king seated himself. The Gate of the Runners belonged therefore to the palace.

The Sept. take בֵּית הַמֶּלֶךְ as a direct genitive, οἶκον τοῦ βασιλέως. It was unquestionably the chief gate, for the solemn entry would not take place through any other (Thenius). Ewald, Thenius, and Bertheau connect הָעֵרֶךְ שְׂקָקָה with the following, in opposition to the massoretic punctuation: "And the city remained quiet when they slew Athaliah with the sword:" that is to say, her adherents remained peaceful and did not venture to make any movement to save her. But, in that case, the words "with the sword" would be unnecessary. The correct interpretation of the words is rather that the concluding sentence is intended to append to ver. 16 an emphatic statement of the manner in which she was put to death, and, at the same time, to call attention to the fact that, by her death, the last member of the house of Ahab was removed, and the legitimate authority of the house of David was restored. In this interpretation this sentence brings the account to a well-rounded close.

APPENDIX.—In the exegetical explanations which precede, only the less important variations of the Chronicles have been noticed, and no account has been taken of the grand divergence of the two narratives in their general conception of the occurrence, in order that the continuous elucidation of the text before us might not be too much interrupted, and in order that no confusion might arise. The chief variation now, one which runs through the entire account, is, that, according to the Chronicler, it was not the centurions of the royal guards, but the priests, the levites, and the family-chiefs, by whose aid Jehoiada accomplished his reformation (2 Chron. xxiii. 2); furthermore, that the first third of the priests and levites who entered upon service on the sabbath were appointed שְׁעָרֵי הַמִּשְׁכָּן, i. e., to be gate-keepers of the threshold, the second to guard the king's house, and the third to keep the gate הַיְסוֹד (vera. 4, 5); finally, that the two classes of priests and levites, those who entered upon, and those who were released from, service, remain together (ver. 8), so that, in general, it is only the temple, and not the royal palace at various points, which is guarded. Modern criticism explains these variations as "arbitrary alterations" of the Chronicler, which he adopted "out of preference for the tribe of Levi, in order to ascribe to the priest-caste an honor which belonged to the prætorians" (Thenius, De Wette). This assertion is, to say the very least, exaggerated. No suspicion of falsehood can attach to the idea that the priests and levites participated in the coronation and inauguration of the new king, especially seeing that the main object to be gained by this was the abolition of idolatry (ver. 17 sq.). The plan of the enterprise, according to the account before us, did not proceed from the centurions of the prætorian guard, but from the head of the priest-class, and it would be astonishing and unnatural if the high-priest had excluded all his comrades in rank, office, and family, from participation in a transaction which was not only political, but also religious, and which took place in the temple. This participation was a matter of course, all the more seeing that the act, according to all the indications (see notes on vers. 4, 13), took place on a feast, at which priests and levites were bound to be present. The author does not, therefore, exclude them, he rather takes their participation for granted, as we see distinctly from ver. 14. Still less does the Chronicler exclude the prætorian guard from participation; he even gives what this author does not give in regard to them, viz., the names of the centurions and of their fathers, and thereby he shows how important their part in the work appeared to him, and also shows that he had not forgotten them, but desired that they should be kept in honorable remembrance. He could not, therefore, have had any intention of robbing them of any honor which belonged to them, and conferring it upon the levites. But while this author permits the participation of the levites to remain unemphasized, as something which was a simple matter of course, the Chronicler, who certainly looks at the history more from the priestly, levitical standpoint, feels bound to give it greater prominence. There is no contradiction between the two accounts in this respect. The case is somewhat different, however, in regard to the other detailed variations. The three localities which were to be held, each, according to the Chronicler, by one third of the priests and levites, cannot possibly have been all in the temple, for the בית המלך, the guard of which is entrusted (ver. 5) to the second third, can only be the king's house or palace, not "the place in the temple where the young king was (in concealment)" (Keil). The "Gate יסוד," which was entrusted to the third third, was, as no one doubts, the same which is called in Kings (ver. 6) the "Gate סוד." It appears there distinctly as a gate of the palace. Probably יסוד is only another reading for סוד. A temple-gate with this name is not mentioned anywhere else. The ספיס, which the first third are to guard (ver. 4), might, according to 1 Chron. ix. 19, be a locality in the temple, but it is utterly impossible that they should be identical, as Keil assumes, with the "Gate of the Runners" in the account here before us (ver. 6), for this gate is distinctly mentioned in ver. 19 as the one through which the king, after the procession, had left the House of Jehovah, was conducted into the palace. According to this account, that gate was guarded by the third third of that portion of the troops under the command of the centurions which entered upon duty on that day, and not by priests and levites, who, of course, never mounted guard at the palace. These variations of the two accounts cannot be reconciled, and we are absolutely forced to admit that the Chronicler, although he made some more detailed extracts from the original document than the author of the Book of Kings, nevertheless did not accurately discriminate between the priests and levites and the military life-guard, and did not keep separate the shares of the two in the transaction. Keil asserts, in order, in spite of this, to bring the two accounts into accord: Jehoiada "determined to carry out the project chiefly by the aid of the priests and levites, who relieved each other, in the service of the temple, on the sabbath, and he entrusted the chief command of these forces to the captains of the royal life-guard, that they, with the force of priests and levites under their command, might take possession of the approaches to the temple, in order to repel any attempt of the military to force an entrance, and might protect the young king. These captains came into the temple without weapons in order not to attract attention, therefore Jehoiada gave them the weapons of king David, which were laid up in the temple." But the account of the Chronicler says nothing of any commission of the command over the priests and levites to the centurions, and this account directly contradicts any such notion (see above, on ver. 5), [not to say anything of the very great intrinsic improbability that any such arrangement—putting military leaders in command of priestly forces—would ever have been adopted, or that, if it had, it would have worked well.—W. G. S.] According to the account before us it is impossible to exclude the troops ordinarily under the command of the centurions from a share in the transaction. It was almost more necessary to get possession of the palace than of the temple, because the king was to make his solemn entry into it, and mount the throne after his coronation. It is not an argument against the notion that a guard was set over the palace, that Athaliah came down out of it to the people in the temple. There was no object in preventing her from coming out; the guard was set to prevent any one from getting in (סָפִיס ver. 6). There is no force in the citation of Josephus (Antiq., 7. 14, 7): "Each of the twenty-four classes of priests took charge of the worship for eight days from sabbath to sabbath," or in the observation that "it is not known that any such arrangement was observed with respect to the life-guards or any other portion of the army," for of course all regular guards had to relieve each other at definite times, and the record says distinctly that this was the custom of the troops who were under command of the centurions.

HISTORICAL AND ETHICAL.

1. The elevation of Joash to the throne of Judah has great importance in the history of redemption, inasmuch as God's guidance and protection of the house of David appears in it, and as it is a confirmation of the promise given to this house that it should never be extinguished, and that its light should never fail (2 Sam. vii. 13 sq.; 1 Kings xi. 36; xv. 4; 2 Kings viii. 19; cf. Pa. cxxii. 17). In the kingdom of Israel the dynasties changed; one overthrew the other and destroyed it; with Jehu the fourth had already begun. In the kingdom of Judah, on the contrary, the house of David had maintained itself until this time. But now, when Jehu had killed Ahaziah and forty-two of his relatives, and all the remaining royal seed had been destroyed by Athaliah, it appeared that the line of David also was at an end. But God wonderfully ordered it so that an infant of this house escaped the massacre and was saved. He remained concealed for years, and it must have been believed that David's lamp had gone out forever, when suddenly the sole remaining offshoot of the house of David ascended the throne, and, with the murderess Athaliah, the last survivor of the house of Ahab perished. As the fulfilment of the promise to protect the house of David must have been recognized in this event, there was in it at the same time, for every faithful servant of Jehovah, a pledge that the God of Israel would protect this house also for the future in any calamities; and so He did, until finally, according to the promise, the great "son of David" came, who was not only the "lamp" of David, but the light of the world, whose kingdom shall have no end (Luke i. 32, 33, 69).

2. All the mischief which the relationship contracted by Jehoshaphat with the house of Ahab (1 Kings xxii., Hist. § 1) had brought upon Judah, culminated in the reign of Athaliah, which brought Judah and its royal house to the verge of ruin. Athaliah was a faithful copy of her mother Jezebel, fanatical, idolatrous, imperious, and cruel. As her mother had controlled Ahab, so she controlled Jehoram and her son Ahaziah. It was she who transplanted idolatry into Judah, which had, until then, been faithful to Jehovah. Under her influence a temple of Baal was built in Jerusalem itself. She plundered the temple of Jehovah and took all the sacred implements for use in the service of Baal (2 Chron. xxiv. 7). After the death of her son she usurped the royal authority, so that a woman came to sit upon the throne, a thing which had never taken place before and never took place afterwards, and which not only was in direct contradiction with one of the essential duties which devolved upon a king of Israel, who, as such, was to be a "servant of God," but also was contrary to the express provision of the law. Maimonides, in the tract Me-lachim, draws this inference, thus: "They place no woman on the throne, for it is said (Deut. xvii. 15): 'Thou shalt in any wise set him king,' not queen. So also, in all positions of dignity and authority, they place only men." Athaliah's usurpation of the throne was the dissolution of the Israelitish monarchy. In order to maintain herself in her usurped authority, she put to death, not, like other usurpers, her opponents, but those who were connected with her own family, her own nephews and grandchildren. The ground for this "senseless crime" (Ewald) cannot be sought in the fact that she desired to annex Judah to Israel, for Jehu was reigning there, but only in the blind and passionate love of power of this "wicked" woman (2 Chron. xxiv. 7), and in her raging hate against the house of David, to which all true servants of Jehovah adhered. For six years she pursued her own courses undisturbed, and believed herself secure, when finally the legitimate heir to the throne, who had escaped the massacre by God's evident protection, appeared and was anointed king. As her mother Jezebel had stood upon her majesty in her dealings with Jehu, and had believed that she could command, so she came, proud and insolent, into the house of Jehovah, and, forgetting the illegitimacy of her own authority, founded, as it was, solely upon violence, she cried out: "Treason, treason!" But again, as her mother had heard her doom pronounced: "Throw her down!" so she hears the command: "Have her forth! and him that followeth her kill with the sword." As there was no one who took the part of the hated woman, she died, abandoned by all her servants, a just and disgraceful death. Thereby Judah and its royal house were saved. Racine concludes his tragedy Athalie, with these words:

*Par cette fin terrible, et due à ses forfaits,
Apprenons, roi des Juifs, et n'oubliez jamais,
Que les rois dans le ciel ont un juge sévère, L'innocence un vengeur, et l'orphelin un père.*

3. The high-priest Jehoiada is, for his time, a very remarkable character. Although, through his wife Jehosheba, he was connected with the idolatrous court, and although he was entrusted with an office which, under the circumstances, was doubly difficult, yet he held firm and true to the God of Israel, and to the legitimate dynasty. The Lord had given the last heir of this line into his hands, and, at the peril of his life, he protects him for years in concealment, guarding him as his own child, and waiting in faith and patience until Jehovah shall give means and ways to restore the apparently exterminated royal house. As the yoke of the tyrannical woman became more and more unendurable, he "strengthened himself" (i. e., took courage, made up his mind) (2 Chron. xxiii. 1), and put his hand to the work. He did not wish to open the way to the throne for the young heir by deceit or craft, by cruelty and bloodshed. In the first place he admits the captains of the military guard into the secret, and makes sure of their assistance; then he causes the priests and levites, and the heads of all the families, i. e., the representatives of the people, to be summoned to Jerusalem for a public festival. He does not wish to do anything by himself alone, but with the consent of the different classes among the entire people. His plan bears witness, not only to his wisdom and prudence, but also to his patriotism. He takes all his measures in such a way that the end is accomplished without tumult or violence, but yet without chance of failure. It is not selfishness and love of power, but pure and disinterested love to Jehovah and to His people which is his motive. Only when Athaliah stigmatizes the restoration of the legitimate order of things as treason and insurrection, puts herself on the defensive, and calls for armed opposition to the movement, does he give orders to lead the crowned monster, as Dereser justly calls her, out of the sanctuary, and deliver her over to her well-deserved fate. His next care then is to renew the covenant between the king and people, exhorting the former to fidelity to the law, and the latter to fidelity to the king. Then finally he leads the king to the throne, and the people put an end to the idol-worship. If ever a man stood pure and blameless in the midst of such a bold, difficult, and far-reaching enterprise, then Jehoiada, the ideal Israelitish priest, did so here.

4. Our modern historians see, in the elevation of the descendant of David to the throne of his fathers, a priest-revolution, just as they see, in the elevation of Jehu, a prophet-revolution. So Duncker (Gesch. d. Alt., s. 417), whom Weber (Gesch., s. 241) follows, states it thus: "The priests of the temple at Jerusalem had yielded to the foreign worship much more easily than the prophets in Israel. The example and the success of the latter gradually exercised an influence upon Judah. After the prophets of Israel had brought about the ruin of the house of Omri, the priests tried to overthrow the last remnant of this family in Judah also. . . . The fall of Joram of Israel, and perhaps also the hope of finding in Joash, the son of Ahaziah, whom the priests held in concealment from Athaliah in the temple, an easy tool for priestly influence, induced the high-priest Jehoiada to undertake the overthrow of the queen." Winer (R.-W.-B., i. s. 111) also presents the incident in a similar manner: "The priests saved her (Athaliah's) grandson, Joash, with the help of a princess, in the temple. When he had grown up he was secretly anointed king, and Athaliah was put to death in a popular insurrection excited by the priests." Here we have another specimen of that history-making which ignores what the text says, and states, as assured historical fact, that which it does not say. That the priests in Judah gave way more easily to the Baal-worship than the prophets of Israel; that they, encouraged by the example and success of the latter, dethroned and murdered Athaliah, and regarded Joash as one who would probably prove an easy tool in their hands; that the priests saved Joash and hid him in the temple; that he was secretly anointed king, and that then a popular rising was instigated by the priests; of all that, there is nothing in either record. On the contrary, both agree in stating that the sister of king Ahaziah, without any assistance from the priests, took away the infant, and hid him in the palace itself, in the bed store-room, and that she then hid him, for greater security, in the temple, which was under the charge of her husband, the high-priest. These two near relatives of the prince were, for six years, the only ones who knew of his existence. Not until the seventh year did Jehoiada admit any one to the secret, and then not the priests, but the captains of the military guard, and he took of them an oath of secrecy. They it was who summoned the chiefs of the people, and the priests, and the levites, to the festival at Jerusalem, and who took the lead in carrying out the plan. The young prince was not anointed "secretly," but as openly as possible. Not only the priests, but also the captains of the royal guard, the representatives of the people, and the people themselves, shouted their acclamations to the new king. The coronation took place without violence, without any scene of public disturbance. The city is quiet, and the people joyful (ver. 20). How can any one then speak of a "popular rising instigated by the priests?" Criticism here comes into contradiction with itself. It declares the record in Chronicles unreliable and unhistorical, because it gives such prominence to the participation of the priests and levites, whereas the record in Kings only mentions the captains of the guard, and yet it says that the entire enterprise was conducted by the priests. But it is radically perverse and false to regard the incident as a revolution or a revolt. That Athaliah, as even De Wette expresses it, "usurped the throne of David," that she took the royal authority into her own hands, that she destroyed all the remaining seed-royal, that was a revolution. What Jehoiada undertook, not by himself, but in harmony with all ranks, and with the representatives of the people, was a repeal of the revolution, and a restoration of the constitutional, divine as well as human, order. It would have been contrary to conscience and to duty, if Jehoiada had gone down to the grave with the secret that there was yet living a legitimate heir of the throne of David. It was most natural that he should take the initiative in the restoration of the legitimate monarchy, because he had the prince under his care, and no one knew anything about him but Jehoiada and his wife. Moreover, it was doubly his duty, as chief of those whose calling it was to guard and teach the law, i. e., the covenant of God with Israel (Mal. ii. 7; Deut. xxxiii. 10; Levit. x. 11), to labor to the end that the organic law of the kingdom, which was a theocracy, should be maintained; and, when this law was trodden under foot by the usurping sovereign, no one was so much bound as he to restore it, that is, to renew the covenant. In the kingdom of Israel, where, since Jeroboam, there was no longer any lawful priesthood (2 Chron. xi. 13 sq.), it was the prophets who had to watch over the covenant of Jehovah and to fight for it. In Judah, on the contrary, "the diminished and weakened priesthood, together with the true Jehovah-prophets, had to form the opposition to the patronage of paganism" (Ewald). Jehoiada's enterprise did not aim to bring about the dominion of the priesthood, but that of the legitimate theocratic dynasty. He, therefore, turned first to the servants of the crown for assistance—aimed to have the new king inaugurated by their power. After this was accomplished, he restored the priestly offices. He aimed at nothing more and nothing less than the restoration of the original theocratic constitution.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Vers. 1-3. Queen Athaliah. (a) Her wicked plans, ver. 1. (Idolatrous and fond of power, like her mother Jezebel, she takes the royal authority into her own hands, in self-will and contrary to right, and murders all the male seed, in order to put an end forever to the house of David. WÜR. SUMM.: We see here whither ambition and love of rule may lead men. Athaliah does not spare her own innocent grandchildren, but causes them to be put to death, only in order that she may be called queen, and may remain such. Sir. iii. 29 sq.). (b) The frustration of her plans, vers. 2 and 3. (Job v. 12; Ps. ii. 4; xxxiii. 10. WÜR. SUMM.: No one can tread down him whom God sustains. Thus, Pharaoh would have been glad to destroy Israel; Saul would have slain David; Herod, the child Jesus; they could not accomplish it, however; they only injured themselves and perished, just as Athaliah did also.)—Ver. 1. Jehoshaphat's marriage of his son with a daughter of the house of Ahab, although he brought it about in a good intention, produced the result that Athaliah ruled over Judah, and brought the dynasty of David to the brink of ruin. NEUE WÜRT. SUMM.: So, many a quiet, humble, God-fearing family has been brought into calamities, affecting both body and soul, by a thoughtless marriage. The hope that those who are brought up by godless parents will themselves reform and turn to the fear of God has very slight foundation.—Vers. 1-4. KRUMMACHER: King Joash. (a) The great danger which threatened him; (b) but how gloriously he was protected, and (c) how high he was elevated.—Ver. 1. When she saw, &c. That which should have made her hesitate and bow in humility to God's judgment, only made her insolent and blood-thirsty. That is the judgment which obstinacy and wilfulness bring upon themselves.—Ver. 2. CALW. BR.: We have an instance in Jehosheba how, even in the midst of godlessness in a family, any one who will can make an exception.—Jehosheba stole him. That was not "stealing" the child, but saving him. What can a woman do better and nobler than to save an infant child from danger of soul and body, and take him under her protection for the sake of God and His promises?—Ver. 3. "He that keepeth Israel shall neither slumber nor sleep." He watches over helpless infants, and holds His protecting hand over them (Matt. xviii. 10; Ps. xci. 11-13).—KRUMMACHER: Joash is a voiceless, yet a mighty, preacher of the security of the elect of God.—When the godless appear to have succeeded in the attainment of their objects, and believe that they have conquered, the very moment of their victory is the unperceived commencement of their ruin. The cross of Christ was the victory of His enemies, but this very victory was what brought about their total defeat.

Vers. 4-12. Joash's Elevation to the Throne. (a) How it was determined upon and prepared, vers. 4-8. (Jehoiada took the initiative in it, for it was his right and duty. It was no rebellion and conspiracy against a just authority, but a fact by itself. Rebels violate law and right in order that they may rule; Jehoiada restored law and right, and did not wish to rule; he remained what he was. He conducted himself with courage, but also with wisdom and prudence. See Historical, § 3.) (b) How it was carried out and accomplished, vers. 9-12. (With the participation and approval of the different classes of the entire people, without conspiracy, bloodshed, or violence; in the house of God, whose servant the king was; the crown and the law were given into his hands; he was anointed; significant symbols of his calling as king of the people of God.)—Ver. 4. Jehoiada, a faithful priest, such as is pleasing to God (1 Sam. ii. 35). It is not hard to proclaim the word of God, when the mighty and great of this world hold to it, but the faithfulness which is needed in the stewards of God's mysteries is that which will not be stayed or impaired, when the great of this world despise and persecute the word; which will sail against the wind of courtly or popular favor, and will persevere in patience (1 Cor. iv. 1, 2).—WÜRT. SUMM.: The servants of the Church in the New Testament have not the same calling as the high-priests in the Old, so that they have not to meddle with worldly affairs.—Where spiritual and worldly authority go hand in hand, where both unite for the sake of God and for His cause, there the Lord gives blessing and prosperity.—Ver. 5 sq. KYBURZ: Jehoiada teaches us by his example that we ought not to shun either danger or labor in a just cause, but also that we should go prudently to work.—Ver. 9 sq. To take weapons in hand and risk one's life for one's country, redounds to the glory and honor of any nation.—Ver. 12. The word of God says: "By me princes rule, and nobles, even all the judges of the earth" (Prov. viii. 16). Therefore kings should be crowned in the house of God. STARKE: The crown and the law of the Lord belong together. God give to Christendom princes who love His Word!

Vers. 13-16. Athaliah's Fall. (a) Her last appearance, vers. 13, 14. (She comes boldly and impudently into the midst of the people, blinded to their disposition towards her. Insolently relying upon her imagined majesty, she commands resistance to the movement which is in progress—a faithful type of many tyrants. Pride goes before a fall.) (b) Her terrible end, vers. 15, 16. (Abandoned, despised, and hated by all the people, who rejoice over her fall, she goes to meet her doom, and receives the fate which her deeds deserve. "All they that take the sword," &c. Matt. xxvi. 52. She is punished by that by which she had sinned.)—And all the people rejoiced. That was no forced joy, produced at command, but a natural and sincere joy. It is great good fortune for a people when its dynasty is preserved. It may and ought to rejoice in the house of God, when God has released it from tyranny and usurpation.—KYBURZ: Sedition! treason! is the cry of Joram, Jezebel, and Athaliah, and of all those who are themselves most to blame for it (Acts xxiv. 5).

Vers. 17-20. The Results of Athaliah's Fall. (a) The renewal of the covenant, ver. 17; (b) the destruction of the Baal-worship, vers. 18, 19; (c) the rest and peace of the land.—Ver. 17. The abolition and extermination of all which is bad and perverse is necessary, but it is beneficial only when the construction of what is true and good is added to it (Jer. i. 10). The reformers of the sixteenth century not only denied and protested, but at the same time they also laid the foundation, other than which none can be laid, and on this they built the Church.—The covenant which Jehoiada renewed. (a) The covenant of the king and the people with God. (The basis and fountain of all national prosperity. An irreligious state is a folly and an impossibility; it is no-thing.) (b) The covenant between king and people. (It is built upon the former. There is prosperity in a country only when the prince rules before and with God, and the people is obedient through obedience to God. Without this fundamental condition all constitutions, laws, and institutions, however good they may appear, are useless.) LANGE: No relation of subjects and rulers is sound if it has not the covenant with God as its basis on either side.—Ver. 18. "The zeal of thine house" (John ii. 17). That applies here to an entire people. (CALW. BRBL): It is a grand national event when a people destroys its idols. He who stands by God and His word tolerates neither gross nor refined idolatry. Where there is decided faith in the living God, the altars of the false gods fall of themselves.—The offices in the House of God. God is a God of order, therefore these offices are necessary (Eph. iv. 11, 12).—Vers. 19, 20. WÜRT. longed life, so that they may lead a peaceful and SUMM.: Where there are pious and faithful rulers, godly life under their government.—Ver. 20. the people should rejoice, should thank God for them, and pray fervently to him for their pro- STARKE: Governments which are founded in blood always end disastrously.

C.—The reign of Joash (or Jehoash).

CHAP. XI. 21—XII. 21 (2 CHRON. XXIV.).

- 21 SEVEN years old was Jehoash when he began to reign.
 XII. 1 In the seventh year of Jehu, Jehoash began to reign; and forty years 2 reigned he in Jerusalem. And his mother's name was Zibiah of Beer-sheba. And Jehoash did that which was right in the sight of the Lord all his days wherein [be-3 cause] Jehoiada the priest instructed him. But the high places were not taken away:
 4 the people still sacrificed and burnt incense in the high places. And Jehoash said to the priests, All the [consecrated] money [omni of the dedicated things] that is [wont to be] brought into the house of the Lord, even the money of every one that passeth the account [current money, both], the money that every man is set at, and 5 all the money that cometh into any man's heart to bring into the house of the Lord, let the priests take it to them, every man of his acquaintance: and let them repair the breaches of the house, wheresoever any breach [every defect which]'
 6 shall be found. But it was so, that in the three and twentieth year of king Je-
 7 hoash the priests had not repaired the breaches of the house. Then king Jehoash called for Jehoiada the priest, and the other priests, and said unto them, Why repair ye not the breaches of the house? now therefore receive no more money of your acquaintance, but [save that ye] deliver it for the breaches of the house.
 8 And the priests consented to receive 'no more money of the people, neither to 9 repair the breaches of the house. But Jehoiada the priest took a chest,' and bored a hole in the lid of it, and set it beside the altar, on the right side as one cometh into the house of the Lord: and the priests that kept the door put 10 therein all the money that was brought into the house of the Lord. And it was so, when they saw that there was much money in the chest, that the king's scribe and the high priest came up, and they put [it] up in bags, and told the money that 11 was found in the house of the Lord. And they gave the money, being told, into the hands of them that did the work, that had the oversight of the house of the Lord: and they laid it out to the carpenters and builders, that wrought 12 upon the house of the Lord, and to masons, and hewers of stone, and to buy timber and hewed stone to repair the breaches of the house of the Lord, and for all 13 that was laid out for the house to repair 'it. Howbeit there were not made for the house of the Lord bowls of silver, snuffers, basins [for sprinkling], trumpets, any vessels of gold, or vessels of silver, of the money that was brought into the 14 house of the Lord: but they gave that to the workmen [commissioners], and 15 repaired therewith the house of the Lord. Moreover they reckoned not with the men, into whose hand they delivered the money to be bestowed on work-16 men: for they dealt faithfully. The trespass-money and sin-money was not brought into the house of the Lord: it was the priests'.
 17 Then Hazael king of Syria went up, and fought against Gath, and took it:
 18 and Hazael set his face to go up to Jerusalem. And Jehoash king of Judah took all the hallowed things that Jehoshaphat, and Jehoram, and Ahaziah, his fathers, kings of Judah, had dedicated, and his own hallowed things, and all the gold that was found in the treasures of the house of the Lord, and in the king's house, and sent it to Hazael king of Syria: and he went away from Jerusalem.

19 And the rest of the acts of Joash, and all that he did, are they not written 20 in the book of the Chronicles of the kings of Judah? And his servants arose, and made a conspiracy, and slew Joash in the house of Millo, which goeth down 21 to Silla. For Jozachar the son of Shimeath, and Jehozabad the son of Shomer, his servants, smote him, and he died; and they buried him with his fathers in the city of David: and Amaziah his son reigned in his stead.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

- ¹ Ver. 5 (6 of the Hebrew text).—[פָּנָה] at the end is a predicate defining אֲשֶׁר, all which shall be found. . .
defective, i. e., all the defective places which shall be found. Cf. chap. viii. 12.
² Ver. 8 (9).—[קָחַתָּ לְקָחַת], the fem. inf. shortened before makkeph. Cf. Ewald, § 218, a.
³ Ver. 9 (10).—אָחֵר אֲחֵרִים אָחֵר is commonly adjective, but is sometimes used as a dependent substantive, as here.
Ew. § 286, d.
⁴ Ver. 12 (13).—[תְּקַן], fem. abstract subst. In verbs which denote a state we find that the infin. is often supplanted by the subst. which expresses the abstract of the verbal idea. "For repairs" = to repair, with which, however, the object must be supplied (Böttcher, § 277, 8).—W. G. S.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 21. Jehoash was seven years old, &c. The parallel record in 2 Chron. xxiv. is indeed more detailed than the one before us, and supplements it in some essential particulars, but it is not by any means an "actual transmutation" of it (Bertheau). Both accounts may well have been drawn from the same original document, since they are word for word the same in some parts.—The name of the mother of Jehoash is given, as is usual in regard to the kings of Judah throughout the history. On Beersheba see note on 1 Kings xix. 3.—The words in ver. 2: All his days that Jehoash the priest instructed him, cannot have the sense that Jehoash did, his whole life long, that which was right in the sight of God (Thenius, Ewald), for this was not true in view of what is related in 2 Chron. xxiv. 17-26, which is confirmed by Matt. xxiii. 35, and which Thenius himself admits must have "historical foundation." The Chronicler writes: "All the days of Jehoash the priest," i. e., so long as Jehoash lived. The sense is, therefore, that Jehoash did what was right because, and so long as, Jehoash was his instructor. Hence the Sept. translate; πᾶσας τὰς ἡμέρας, ὥς ἐβίωντο αὐτὸν 'Iowadē ō iepetēs; and the Vulgate: cunctis diebus, quibus docuit eum Jojada sacerdos; so also De Wette and Luther [and the E. V.]. Keil: "All his days that, i. e., all that part of his life in which Jehoash instructed or guided him." For the use of אֲשֶׁר he refers to Ew. § 331, c. 3. [The suffix is repeated after אֲשֶׁר except in general expressions of time, place, and manner.] For the suffix in יָמָיו he refers to chap. xiii. 14. The athnach cannot be held to be decisive in this case. For the rest, it does not follow, when we translate: "All his days, because Jehoash instructed him," that he continued to do well even after Jehoash's death. Grotius remarks on the statement: "Sic bonus Nero, quamdiu Seneca unus est magistro." [If the suffix in יָמָיו is retained, then the massoretic punctuation is correct: the athnach has its ordinary force; אֲשֶׁר must be translated "because;" and the sense is that he was a good king all his life long, because of the good instruction which he received in his youth from Jehoash.

That is the simple grammatical statement of the book of Kings. If the י at the end of יָמָיו can be sacrificed, then the athnach must be removed and Jehoash is a genitive depending on יָמָיו. Let it be observed that this suffix is neglected in the versions of the Chron., Sept., and Vulg., quoted above. The sense then is that he was good as long as Jehoash lived. This last has in its favor that it is consistent with the account in Chron. Bähr translates by "because," preserving the suffix in יָמָיו, and tries to interpret the other meaning into this translation. The words: "He did well all his days, because Jehoash was his instructor," would never suggest that he ceased to do well after his teacher died. This attempt is fruitless, and we must make choice between the alternatives presented above—either to sacrifice the suffix in יָמָיו, and bring the account here into consistency with that in Chron., or to hold to the text and admit the discrepancy. It is a proceeding which a sound criticism cannot approve, to alter the text in the interest of supposed reconciliations. The rendering of the E. V. saves the suffix, and still produces the other sense by translating אֲשֶׁר, "wherein," but this is entirely contrary to the usage of the language. It would require a prep. and suffix after אֲשֶׁר, referring back to יָמָיו.—W. G. S.] On sacrifices on the high places, see note on 1 Kings iii. 2.

Ver. 4. And Jehoash said to the priests, &c. The temple had fallen out of repair, not so much on account of its age (it had only been standing for 130 years) as because it had not been properly preserved under the previous reigns, nay, even had been injured by Athaliah and her sons, and the money intended to keep it in repair had been misappropriated to the worship of Baal (2 Chron. xxiv. 7). The king therefore called upon the priests, whose calling it was, to take measures for the restoration and repair of the building, and, to this end, to collect the same tax which Moses had once laid for the purpose of building the tabernacle (2 Chron. xxiv. 6). כֹּל כֶּסֶף הַקֹּדֶשִׁים וְנֹו, i. e., all the silver which was wont to be brought into the sanctuary, and to be given for its purposes. This is now de-fixed more particularly by the following words, כֶּסֶף עֹבֵר, i. e., not "floating money," irregular income, money from mere accidental gifts (Ewald), but current money (Luther: das gang und gebe ist. Cf. Gen. xxiii. 16, where the expression cannot be taken in any other way). It does not mean coined money, for the Hebrews had no coined money before the exile, so far as we know, but pieces of silver which had a fixed weight, and which were weighed out from man to man in the transaction of business. The reason why this kind of money was called for was, that "it was to be paid out at once to mechanics for their labor" (Thenius). Keil, following the rabbis, insists upon the translation: "money of the numbered," referring back to Ex. xxx. 13 sq.

(כֶּסֶף עֹבֵר עֲלֵהֶפְקִים); but against this translation there is the decisive consideration that it does not say: "money of him who passeth among the numbered," but simply: "money which passes over," that is, which passes from hand to hand in the transaction of affairs. The special cases are then mentioned in which this kind of money usually came into the treasury. The first is the one mentioned and ordained Lev. xxvii. 2 sq. (cf. Numb. xviii. 15), when any one fulfilled a vow. In this case, the priest had to fix the sum to be paid according to the sex, age, &c. of the one who had made the vow. This ransom was appropriated in the time of Moses to the support of the sanctuary. The second case was where any one brought money as a gift to the sanctuary of his own free will.—According to the account in 2 Chron., the king ordered the priests to go out through the cities of Judah, and to collect the tax year by year. This does not contradict the statement before us, but rather serves to explain the words in ver. 5: "every man of his acquaintance." The dependence was upon free-will offerings, as was the case in reference to the tabernacle (Ex. xxxv. 21); the priests and levites were to exert themselves to collect these, each one in his own city and in his own circle. It is to be observed that the king did not demand of the priests that they should give up, for the repairs of the temple, any income which properly came to themselves, but that he only laid claim, for this purpose, to the funds which Moses had ordained should be used in this way.

Ver. 6. But it was so, that in the three and twentieth year, &c. According to 2 Chron. xxiv. 5, the king had commanded the priests to hasten, "but they did not hasten." Even in the 23d year of the reign of Jehoash, i. e., in the year in which there was a change of occupant of the throne of Israel (chap. xiii. 1), the priests had not yet attended to the repairs of the temple, or, at best, had only attended to them very imperfectly. We cannot tell how long before his 23d year he had commanded them to see to it, but it was certainly not in his first year, when he was only seven years old. He now proposes that he will take the matter into his own hands, and adopt other measures for accomplishing it, to which they agree. This interpretation is enforced by אָמְרוּ, ver. 8: "they consented" (Sept., συμφωνησαν, cf. Gen. xxxiv. 15, 22, 23), which cannot possibly mean: "They were obliged to yield to the determination of the king" (Thenius). אָמְרוּ and the following words, ver. 7, "It was placed בְּיָדָם of the House of the Lord, do not contain a strict command, but rather a proposal: nolite ergo amplius accipere (Vulg.), otherwise the corresponding statement would be that they "obeyed," not that they "consented." Only after the king had taken the matter into his own hands did he give orders (2 Chron. xxiv. 8) to make a chest, &c. [The commentators differ widely in their judgment of the conduct of the priests in this matter, some seizing eagerly upon an incident which reflects discreditably upon them, others insisting upon a construction which shall exonerate them entirely. Bähr does not take up the point distinctly in this place. Yet ver. 8 is very obscure, and it is important for its elucidation to understand the attitude of the priests. The disposition of the priests is the key to the situation, and the correct conception of that point is the key to the correct exegesis of the verse. The impression is unavoidable that the first effort failed because it was in the hands of the priests. The payments in liquidation of vows were appropriated to the support of the worship. According to the Chronicler an especial demand was made for free-will offerings for the repairs, and "that which it came into the heart of any man to give" must be understood of offerings for this special end. Otherwise we might think that it referred simply to pious gifts, which the priests were wont to retain for themselves, and which the giver expected that they would retain. If we adopt the statement of the Chronicler, then, it is clear that the priests could not have used the money for themselves without embezzlement. In any case the re-appropriation to the repairs of the temple of sums which they had probably been using for some time (especially during the prevalence of idolatry) for their own support, must have curtailed their resources. That they gave them up willingly, is not to be supposed. Sums thus appropriated, but left in the administration of persons all whose interests were opposed to this use, would not probably be found to suffice for an energetic prosecution of the work. This would also check the zeal, and stop the offerings, of the people. The systematic revenue of the priests under the Mosaic constitution had been broken up during the time of apostasy; they had been obliged to make use of all the revenues of whatever kind for their own support; and the incident does not seem, when viewed fairly, to prove any extraordinary selfishness on their part. The king now, seeing that the measures he had taken to accomplish his object had only served to frustrate it, ordered them not to receive any more money for themselves, but to devote all they received to this object. Between vers. 7 and 8 a discussion must be understood in which the priests explained the defects in the practical workings of this scheme, and the result was an agreement that they should neither serve as collectors of the money nor be responsible for the repairs. They put the whole matter out of their hands. (See Histor. § 3.—W. G. S.)

Ver. 9. But Jehoiada the priest took a chest, &c. The king did not even now exclude the priests from all share in the work, but took his measures in conjunction with the chief-priest, and also appointed "the priests that kept the door" to receive the money. The chest had a hole in its lid, into which the money was dropped. It was locked, and was only opened when it was full. Its position was by the side of the altar, on the right as one entered the temple. Instead of this we read in Chronicles:

הַחֵזֶק, i. e., "outside." It did not, therefore, stand in the middle of the priests' court (Thenius), but outside of it, at the entrance-gate which was on its right. According to 2 Chron. xxiv. 9 and 10, the king caused this arrangement to be proclaimed throughout the whole country; it was joyfully heard, and the people now gave abundantly. [The most reasonable explanation of this is, that, under the new arrangement, a man saw his gift placed in the chest. He knew that this was inaccessible to all except the appointed officers, and that his gift was, therefore, sure to be applied to the object for which he gave it. The share of the priests was reduced to the mechanical duty of receiving the money and placing it in the chest.—W. G. S.] When the chest was full, the priest sent his scribe, i. e., a civil secretary, and, in his presence, the chest was opened. This "was done, not out of distrust of the priests, but because the repairs were a matter of state interest, and not merely an affair of the priests. The temple was the chief sanctuary of the nation, of the theocracy, and it was under the supervision of the king" (Lisco). The money was bound up in bags and counted (cf. 2 Kings v.

23). (The Chronicler has חֵזֶק for חֵזֶק, i. e., they emptied out. So the Vulg. also on the verse before us: effundebantque et numerabant pecuniam.) "The binding up in bags is mentioned before the counting because the pieces were not counted separately. They were bound up in bags and these were weighed in order thus to estimate the sum which had been received" (Keil).—Them . . . that had the oversight of the House of the Lord, to whom the money was given (ver. 11), are those who had to oversee the building. According to 2 Chron. xxxiv. 12, they were levites. The כֶּרִי הַמִּשְׁפָּחִים is supported by 2 Kings xxii. v. The sense remains the same. These overseers then paid the wages to the artisans of different kinds, and purchased the necessary building materials.—The statement in vers. 13 and 14 does not contradict 2 Chron. xxiv. 14. It is there stated that, when the building was finished, and still some money remained, this was placed at the disposition of the king and the high-priest, who used it to procure gold and silver utensils. On these utensils, see 1 Kings vii. 50.—No accounts were demanded of the overseers of the building, we are told in ver. 15, because they were implicitly trusted. 2 Kings xxii. 7 shows that there is no reference here to a presumed infidelity of the priests, for the same words are used there, where the priests had not had anything at all to do with the work. It is only intended to call attention to the conscientiousness with which this work was taken in hand, inasmuch as the most trustworthy men were charged with it. The remark in ver. 16 has a similar object, viz., to show that the priests did not suffer on account of the new arrangement, but that the revenues which properly belonged to them, those from the trespass-offerings and the sin-offerings, were still given to them. On the trespass-offerings, see Numb. v. 8 sq., and Levit. v. 16. According to the law, the priest received no money from the sin-offering. We must, therefore, suppose that it had become customary to give them a voluntary gift of money besides the flesh of the sacrifice (Levit. vi. 24).

Ver. 17. Then Hazael, king of Syria, went up, &c. This expedition belongs to the time when Jehoiada was already dead, and Jehoash had fallen into sin, as is clear from 2 Chron. xxiv. 15-22. As Gath, one of the five cities of the Philistines (Josh. xiii. 3), lay much farther south than Samaria, and was almost due west of Jerusalem towards the sea-coast, this expedition against it forces us to assume that Israel had been already conquered by Hazael (chap. xiii. 3). We must leave undecided whether Gath at that time belonged to Judah, or had fallen again into the possession of the Philistines. As Jerusalem was not far off, the conqueror was led to attack it next, but he was induced, by the surrender of the treasures, to withdraw. It is certain that 2 Chron. xxiv. 23 sq. does not refer to another, earlier expedition, as Thenius asserts. That account does not contradict the one before us; on the contrary it supplements it "most fittingly, for it is very improbable a priori that Jehoash purchased peace by this heavy sacrifice, until after he had suffered the shameful defeat of which the Chronicler gives an account. Moreover, the fact that the Syrians withdrew without prosecuting their victory farther is explained by this peace thus purchased" (Bertheau).

Ver. 18. And Jehoash . . . took all the hallowed things, &c. Clericus answers the question why, if there was such a store of these valuable articles, they were not used for the repairs, instead of collecting taxes and offerings, as follows: Credibile est, res consecratas, quarum hic fit mentio, vasa fuisse sacra, quae vendere aut in monetam constare et cedere nolebant, ut servarentur in extrema necessitatis casus, qualis hic erat, ubi Jerosolyma et totius regni agebatur. In regard to the implied statement that offerings had been dedicated by Jehoram and Ahaziah, who walked in the way of the house of Ahab (chap. viii. 18, 27), let it be observed that these kings did not formally abolish the worship of Jehovah, but only introduced the worship of Baal by the side of it, and, in order not to come into an open conflict with the people and the influential priesthood, they even made offerings to the temple of Jehovah. The utensils which, according to 2 Chron. xxiv. 7, Athaliah and her sons had taken from the temple, and misappropriated to the service of Baal, "had no doubt been restored to their original purpose before the occasion mentioned in chap. xi. 18" (Thenius).

Ver. 20. And his servants arose, &c. The Chronicler here gives a very essential addition to the narrative. He states in detail the reasons for the conspiracy, and the occasion of it. The conspirators murdered the king in his bed, where he was confined by wounds, probably by those received in the war with the Syrians.—בֵּית מִלָּא

Thenius translates: "In the castle-palace." Millo was a castle or tower, it is true (see above, note on 1 Kings ix. 15; cf. 2 Sam. v. 9), but בֵּית מִלָּא can hardly refer to a particular building inside this castle. If it did, we should need to have הַמִּלָּא, with the article, as in the other places. As a complete fortress in itself, Millo might be called בֵּית. The more definite description הַיָּדִיד מִלָּא is itself obscure. No one of the explanations proposed deserves decided preference to the others. All the old versions take מִלָּא as a proper name, and this certainly seems more correct than to consider it identical with סִכְלָה, a street, as Grotius and Thenius do, or with סִכְלָם, slope or ascent, as Ewald does.—In ver. 21, instead of: "Jozachar, the son of Shimeath, and Jehozabad, the son of Shomer," the Chronicler has: "Zabad, the son of Shimeath, an Ammonitess, and Jehozabad, the son of Shimrith, a Moabitess." We must give the preference to this latter statement as the more complete, for the designation of the two mothers instead of the two fathers, as an Ammonitess and a Moabitess, cannot be an invention of the Chronicler, but is taken from the original document. Perhaps it is stated to show that the murderers were not of Jewish descent, but came from foreign mothers. "זָכָר is a mistake for זָכָר, and this is a shorter form for יֶזְכָּר" (Keil), and יֶזְכָּר may have arisen from the defective form יֶזְכָּרֶת by dropping the ת. ["Although the names (as given in Kings) are certainly historical, yet it is very remarkable that the etymology of them, Jehovah-remembers, son of Hearing, and Jehovah-awards, son of Watcher, suggests the last words of Zechariah: 'Jehovah sees it and will requite it' (Thenius).] The further statement of the Chronicler: "and they buried him in the city of David, but they buried him not in the sepulchres of the kings," does not contradict this record. "He was buried in the city of David, where his fathers were buried, but not in the sepulchres of the kings" (Bertheau), probably on account of the action mentioned in 2 Chron. xxiv. 17 sq.

HISTORICAL AND ETHICAL.

1. The author chooses out of the history of the forty years' reign of Jehoash the restoration of the temple, of which he speaks particularly, and passes over the other incidents which the Chronicler narrates. He would hardly have done this if he had seen in this restoration nothing more than a matter of ordinary business routine, a necessity which had arisen in the course of time. The temple, as the dwelling of Jehovah in the midst of His people, is the visible sign and pledge of the covenant (see note on the Temple after the Ezek. section on 1 Kings vi.). The covenant of Jehovah was solemnly restored and renewed at the elevation of the rescued scion of the house of David to the throne, and the temple, the sign and pledge of this covenant, which had become dilapidated, and had been plundered, under Jehoram, Ahaziah, and Athaliah, could not be left in that condition. On the contrary, it must be the chief task of the new king of the dynasty of David, who had sworn to the covenant on his accession, to restore the temple during his reign. As David was the founder, and Solomon the builder, of the House of Jehovah, so Jehoash, with whom the House of David recommenced, as it were, was the restorer of the sanctuary. We have here, therefore, a theocratic action, a physical confession of faith, and a seal upon the renewal and restoration of the covenant. This is why it is so especially mentioned as the most important incident in the reign of Jehoash. The reason why Jehoash, when he undertook the restoration of the temple, unquestionably at the instigation of Jehoiada, did not carry out the work at the expense of the royal treasury, but called upon the whole people to contribute, as Moses had once done for the tabernacle (Exod. xxv. 2-9), was not that "the crown was not then by any means able, as it had been in Solomon's time, to carry out such works by itself" (Ewald), but rather, in order that the entire people might give a physical proof that it had renewed the covenant with Jehovah (chap. xi. 17).

2. King Jehoash was not by any means a ruler who was distinguished for intellect and strength. Lack of independence, and moral weakness, were the most noticeable features of his character. He had in Jehoiaada the support which he needed. After the death of this counsellor and guide, he became, although he was already advanced in life, vacillating, and fell into evil courses. It was a great weakness on the part of one who had renewed the covenant with Jehovah, and rebuilt the temple, to yield to the entreaties of the chiefs of Judah, who flattered him by their cringing submissiveness, and to allow them (2 Chron. xxiv. 17 sq.) the forbidden, lascivious worship of Ashtaré (see Ezek. on 1 Kings xi. 5). It was something more than weakness that he caused Zechariah, the son of his former counsellor, to be stoned, when he condemned this mistaken course, and predicted calamity (2 Chron. xxiv. 20 sq.). No less weak was his conduct in his dealings with Hazael. Instead of making a vigorous opposition to him, trusting in God, as Hezekiah did (chap. xix.), he surrendered to him, although he had only a small force, all the consecrated offerings which his ancestors had made to the temple, and all those which he himself had dedicated up to this point in his reign, in order to induce him to withdraw (ver. 18 sq.; 2 Chron. xxiv. 24). [Observe, however, the exegetical note on ver. 17, quotation from Bertheau, at the end.—W. G. S.] It is very possible that he had embittered the people against him by all this, and thus given occasion for the conspiracy, as a result of which he fell. "He was the first king of Judah who came to a violent end at the hands of his own subjects, and the discontent was so great that he was not even buried in the royal sepulchres. Such was the disgraceful end of one whose childhood was marked by such wonderful providences" (Schlier). He shows us, by his example, whither weakness in a prince may lead. It is not only a something wanting, but it is the weightiest sin. Ewald contradicts himself when he says, basing the statement upon בָּלִיְיָ, ver. 2: "He adopted the principles of his teacher with such docility that he remained true to them even after he came of age," and then says again, a few pages further on: "Heathenism may indeed have gained a footing again under his weak rule." This view also contradicts the statement in 2 Chron. xxiv. 23, whose historical truth is admitted. Thenius also forces the words בָּלִיְיָ in such a way that he calls Jehoash a "praiseworthy king," and speaks of his "good reign," and of his "continuous good conduct." In regard to the narrative of the Chronicler, which is inconsistent with this view, he remarks, giving it a strained and unnatural construction: "Probably this command (to stone Zechariah) was given by Jehoash in a moment of rage, and was forced from him, as it were, by Zechariah's enemies." But, even if we let this pass, the "purchase of a peace from Hazael by a shameful surrender" was not the act of a "praiseworthy king;" and the murder of Jehoash was not a "mere act of revenge." The pains which are taken to present this king in any other light than that in which he appears in these two biblical records, are all spent in vain. The opinion that "Psalm li. contains a prayer of Jehoash in deep penitence for his error" (Thenius), must be regarded as very mistaken. Neither can it be inferred from these historical records, as it is by Vaihinger (in Herzog, Real-encyc., vi. s. 717), that the prophet Joel belongs to the time of this king, and that his prophecies apply to the events of this reign.

3. In regard to the conduct of the priests in reference to the restoration of the temple which the king had commanded, the opinions are very divergent. The assertion of J. D. Michaelis and De Wette, that the priests had embezzled the funds collected for this object, is to be summarily dismissed. Thenius goes still further, and says: "They (the priests) did nothing towards carrying out the project, because the royal command appropriated a part, probably no insignificant part, of the revenues of the priests, in the intention of diminishing their arrogance. . . . The priesthood may have fallen greatly in a moral point of view since Athaliah's influence had brought the Jehovah-religion into neglect, and their attention may have been exclusively directed to their own selfish interest. . . . Probably the priests had kept the free-will offerings, which were intended for the repairs of the temple, entirely for their own use, contrary to law." But the text does not say that the king intended to restrict the revenues of the priests; on the contrary, it is expressly stated (ver. 16) that this was not done. Neither is there any hint of any moral decay in the priesthood. [The idea that the priests were guilty of any arrogance which needed curbing is certainly imported into the case. It is a priori very unlikely that they would be guilty of this fault on emerging from the circumstances in which they had been during the previous years. Arrogance is the sin of long and great prosperity. The a priori probability that the priesthood had suffered in morale during the prevalence of idolatry is great, also that their revenues had been greatly impaired.—W. G. S.] The king would never have commissioned them to undertake the management of this work, if they had had the reputation of being dishonest in money matters. Still less, if unfaithfulness and cheating on their part had been the cause that the contributions did not flow in in sufficient abundance, would he have "asked these priests for their consent (ver. 8) to the change of his first arrangements, and to the new measures which he proposed. Moreover, he would not have charged the priests who guarded the door to receive the money and put it in the chest, which arrangement still left them an opportunity for dishonesty" (Keil). [The circumstantial description of the box, its arrangement and position, show that it was intended to free the priests from any suspicion, just or not, which attached to them. If the suspicion was unjust, they were most interested in a public arrangement for the reception of these contributions which should free them from it. It is enough to suppose that, when all the money, that intended for themselves and that intended for the repairs, came into their hands, the distribution of it according to the intentions of the givers may have been uncertain and imperfect. At any rate, the givers could not be certain that their money would reach its destined object. Any such popular distrust would, according to all experience, speedily reduce the contributions to a very languid flow. The chest-arrangement now accomplished two objects. It permitted the giver to divide his offering for the temple from the offering for the priests, and to see for himself that it was at once put where it could not be applied otherwise than as he intended. The true force of ver. 16 is that, at this time, the revenues of the temple were divided and definitely appropriated, and that the sorts of revenue there mentioned were specifically set apart for the support of the priests. When the priests' share in the transaction was limited to the reception of the money and its immediate deposition in a receptacle, which is expressly declared to have been in the most public place in the temple enclosure, it was impossible to suspect them any longer of dishonesty, unless they were most accomplished rogues. There is no express mention of any dishonesty in the record, but this arrangement with the chest has unquestionably suggested a suspicion which has always been felt by readers of the passage. See also bracketed note under Exegetical on ver. 8.—W. G. S.] On the other hand, the reason for the new scheme was not "simply this, that the first plan had proved inadequate for the purpose," because the king "had not appropriated any definite sum for the repairs of the temple, but had left it to the priests to pay for the repairs out of the gross sum received" (Keil). The text itself gives the true reason in clear and definite words (2 Chron. xxiv. 5): "The levites hastened it not," as the king had commanded them. [If this were the only reason, the pertinency of the arrangement with the chest would not be apparent.—W. G. S.] The reason was not, therefore, dishonesty and embezzlement on the part of the priests and levites, but their lack of zeal, their indifference and neglect in an affair in which they, as servants of the sanctuary, ought to have been most interested. It is as impossible to acquit them of all blame as it is to convict them of dishonesty. When a chest was placed in the temple for the sole purpose of receiving the offerings for this purpose, and when particular officers were designated to take charge of the fund, there was an end of the languid activity of the priests and levites in the collection of the contributions. Each one who came to the temple brought his gift cheerfully, as is distinctly stated in 2 Chron. xxiv. 10. De Wette's assertion that the Chronicler "smoothed over" the matter, out of his well-known affection for the priesthood, is entirely arbitrary, for the record does not contain a syllable about unfaithfulness; it states, on the contrary, that it was the priests who received the money and placed it in the chest, under the second plan.

[From the note on ver. 8 and the inserted remarks in the above section, it will be seen that this delineation of the "conduct of the priests" in this matter is not satisfactory. If we look at the record without unfair partisan feeling either against or in behalf of the priests, we cannot avoid the conviction that their fault was not lin-

led to a want of zeal in the collection of funds, but that it was connected with their administration of the money. In ver. 4 the king charged them to take certain moneys and use them for the repairs of the temple. He addressed them because they were the proper parties to be commissioned to do this work. It was not until they proved incompetent, in some way or other, that it was taken out of their hands, or that they gave it up. The revenues which are specified in ver. 4 are, 1, that at which "every man is set," which is to us very obscure, but is probably correctly explained in the Exegetical note on the verse; and 2, free-will offerings which the priests were to solicit of their acquaintances. In the king's twenty-third year the work had not been done. There was fault somewhere. In ver. 7 the king's address distinctly implies that the work had not been done because the money which had been received from the "acquaintances" of the priests had not been appropriated to this purpose. Various reasons for this are suggested in the translator's note on ver. 7, which are sufficient without assuming that the priests had dishonestly taken for themselves what had been intended for another use. It is very probable that the revenues had never been distinguished in a manner sufficiently definite, or that, if they had formerly been definitely distinguished and appropriated, they had been used indiscriminately for the support of the priests, during the troubles of the last two reigns, and had not all together more than sufficed for this purpose. Ver. 16 implies that the various revenues were now definitely appropriated, and one of the advantages of the chest-plan was that it served to distinguish them. The reply of the priests to this reproach and command (ver. 7) is not given, but they consented to yield up the entire work and the entire responsibility. This gap between vers. 7 and 8 is the place at which the various inventions, more or less derogatory to the priests, find entrance. It is as fair as any supposition which can be made, and accords as well with ver. 8, to suppose that they denied the imputation, pointed out the difficulty in distinguishing the revenues intended for the temple from those intended for the priests, and surrendered the responsibility both for the money and for the work. The plan then adopted, which put this money by itself, and out of the control of the priests, proves conclusively that the work had not been accomplished because the money intended for it passed through their hands. Their administration of it had been defective, to say the least; it is not necessary to conclude that it had been intentionally dishonest.—W. G. S.]

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL

(2 Chron. xxiv. is to be compared throughout as a supplementary record.) Vers. 1-21. The Reign of King Jehoash. (a) During Jehoiaada's life-time, vers. 1-16; (b) after his death, vers. 17-21.—Vers. 1-4. KYBURS: Woe to thee, O land, when thy king is a child! (Eccl. x. 16) but blessed is the nation, the youth of whose prince is in just and holy guidance. Such good fortune had Judah under the guardian care of the wise and experienced Jehoiaada.—That which appears to be the greatest misfortune for a child, to be left fatherless and motherless at an early age, often becomes a great blessing in the gracious Providence of God. What would have become of Jehoash if he had been brought up at the court of his idolatrous father and his depraved mother? God gave him in Jehoiaada far more than he had lost in his father and his mother.—There is no greater blessing possible for a young prince, who comes to the throne in his youth, than to have a wise counsellor. Would that God might give to every prince a Jehoiaada! The first duty of a prince is to pray God for such an one, and to listen to his counsel.—None need instruction more than those who are called to govern; there is no more responsible calling than that of instructing those who will have to rule. Unfortunately this task is rarely entrusted to those who, like Jehoiaada, are fitted for it by age, learning, experience, and piety. WÜRT. SUMM.: We ought to pray to God for wise counsellors, to thank Him for them, to pray for long life for them, and to regard it as a heavy divine punishment when He takes them away (Jer. iii. 4).—Ver. 3. THE SAME: Rulers ought not to allow themselves to be restrained from carrying out what is good and right from any fear of persons, lest they may possibly incur the disfavor of the people. There never was a prince who was not himself guilty of faults and errors, as we see here from the example of Jehoash, who did not abolish the sacrifices on the high places.

Vers. 4-16. The Restoration of the Sanctuary. (a) The king's command to undertake it; (b) the conduct of the priests in the matter (see Historical, § 3). It is true that God does not dwell in temples made with hands (1 Kings viii. 27; Acts vii. 48); we can worship Him as well in a ruin as in the most magnificent church. But when the building, in which a congregation assembles to worship God, to hear His word, and to receive the means of grace, is left ruinous, God does not receive the honor which belongs to Him. Where the churches fall to ruins, there religion and piety also fall into decay; but where there is love of God and joy in His word, there no ruinous churches are seen. A time in which magnificent palaces, theatres, and ball-rooms are repaired or built at great expense, but in which the houses of God are left small, wretched, dirty, and ruinous, is a time of religious decay, and resembles the time of Athaliah in Judah.—The apostle says of the Christian church: "For ye are the temple of the living God" (2 Cor. vi. 16). This temple also may in time become ruinous through unbelief, worldly life and behavior, and immorality. Where are the congregations in which there is nothing ruinous or decayed, in which nothing could be improved? How many are in ruins and are ready to fall! He who destroys the temple of God, or allows it to be destroyed, him will God destroy (1 Cor. iii. 17). We cannot indeed repair these breaches by money. They can only be repaired by coming to the living stone, which is rejected of men, but which is chosen of God (1 Peter ii. 4-6).—Vers. 4 and 5. The congregation ought to be called upon to contribute to religious objects, which can only be accomplished by expending money. How long a time often elapses before means enough are collected even for the most necessary objects, not to mention that many give unwillingly (2 Cor. ix. 7).—Vers. 6-8. Works which are pleasing to God cannot be accomplished by careless hands. They are only accomplished where zeal is united with perseverance, patience, and fidelity.—There have always been such careless, indifferent priests and pastors, and there are such yet. They execute their traditional, official duties, but only by routine, and from a sense of duty, not with zeal and enthusiasm. No zeal for the kingdom of God (John ii. 17) and for the salvation of souls can be noticed in them. How many a congregation has fallen into decay and remained so, because those who were appointed to be the builders of it, who ought to have repaired and built it, have not raised their negligent hands (Hebr. xii. 12). "Cursed be he that doeth the work of the Lord deceitfully" (Jerem. xlviii. 10). Although no earthly king may ever call them to account, yet the heavenly king, before whose judgment-seat they must appear to give an account of their office, will ask: "Why repair ye not the breaches of the house?"—Ver. 10 sq. WÜRTSUMM.: In former times, under the papacy, the church authorities excluded all secular persons from the affairs which belonged to the clergy: under the gospel, in some places, secular persons aim to exclude the clergy from all participation in church affairs, and claim to rule alone; so the matter is always wrongly treated, and men go from one mistake to another; this should not be so.—Public account should be rendered of all moneys and gifts which are collected for religious or benevolent purposes, in order that it may be known that they are applied as was designed, and that the giver may be encouraged to further liberality.—Vers. 11 and 12. The laborer is worthy of his hire. Wages ought to be given punctually to diligent and faithful workmen (Jer. xxii. 13; Levit. xix. 13).—Vers. 13 and 14. What is necessary and useful is always to be preferred to what is beautiful; only when the former is provided may the latter be thought of. How often the contrary course is pursued.—Ver. 15. What a proud thing it is for builders and workmen when they can be trusted, and it is not necessary to oversee them. When work is carried on honestly and faithfully, then God's blessing follows.—Ver. 16. STARKE: To every one his own, to God what is God's, to the priests what is theirs (Sir. vii. 32; 1 Cor. ix. 11).—Let not anything which justly belongs to any one be taken from him.

Vers. 17-21. The Fall of King Jehoash and its Consequences. (a) As long as Jehoiada lived, Jehoash did what was right: when he had lost this support he fell (2 Chron. xxiv. 15-22). "Let him that thinketh he standeth take heed lest he fall" (1 Cor. x. 12). "It is a good thing that the heart be established with grace" (Hebr. xiii. 9). How many have begun in the spirit and ended in the flesh (Gal. iii. 3). The best instruction cannot preserve against a fall, if the heart is not firm and strong. Only he who endures unto the end shall be saved, therefore: "Be thou faithful," &c. (Rev. ii. 10). The noblest commencement is vain, if the end is perverse and wicked; on the contrary: "All is well that ends well." (b) At the time when Jehoash had sinned so grievously, one calamity after another came upon him; first, the great defeat (vers. 17 and 18), by which he lost all his treasures, then, the conspiracy which cost him his life (vers. 20 and 21). So the words of the dying prophet (2 Chron. xxiv. 22) were fulfilled: "The Lord look upon it and require it!" (2 Chron. xxiv. 22). So Jehoash was taught what calamities it brings to abandon the Lord God (Jer. ii. 19). The Lord rewards every one according to his works, whether in this or the next world. What a man soweth, that shall he also reap. Jehoash was marvellously preserved as an infant (chap. xi. 2, 3), he ends his life wretchedly.—STARKE: This is an example how near the ruin of a man is when he abandons the good to which he was educated from his youth up, nay, even is glad to be rid of those who annoy him by their warnings.—Ver. 18. A man may buy with money his acquittal from a human tribunal, but not from the just judgment of God; nothing helps here but repentance and a new life (Ezek. xviii. 26-28).—Vers. 20 and 21. All the people shouted to the child-king: "Long live the king!" and rejoiced and blew the trumpets. Conspiracy and murder were the end of his forty-years' reign. Sic transit gloria mundi.

SECOND SECTION.

THE MONARCHY UNDER JEHOAHAZ AND JOASH AND JEROBOAM II. IN ISRAEL, AND UNDER AMAZIAH IN JUDAH.

2 KINGS XIII.—XIV.

A.—The Reigns of Jehoahaz and Joash.

CHAP. XIII. 1–25.

- 1 In the three and twentieth year of Joash the son of Ahaziah king of Judah, Jehoahaz the son of Jehu began to reign over [became king of] Israel in Samaria, and reigned seventeen years. And he did that which was evil in the sight of the Lord, and followed the sins of Jeroboam the son of Nebat, which made
- 3 Israel to sin; he departed not therefrom. And the anger of the Lord was kindled against Israel, and he delivered them into the hand of Hazael king of Syria, and into the hand of Ben-hadad the son of Hazael, all their [the] days [of Jehoahaz].
- 4 And Jehoahaz besought¹ the Lord, [.] [() And the Lord hearkened unto him: for he saw the oppression of Israel, because [that] the king of Syria oppressed
- 5 them. ([omit () And the Lord gave Israel a saviour, so that they went out from under the hand of the Syrians: and the children of Israel dwelt in their
- 6 tents, as beforetime.² Nevertheless they departed not from the sins of the house of Jeroboam, who made Israel sin,³ but walked therein: and there remained
- 7 [stood] the grove [statue of Astarte] also in Samaria.) Neither did [For] he leave [had left] of the people to Jehoahaz but fifty horsemen, and ten chariots, and ten thousand footmen; for the king of Syria had destroyed them, and had
- 8 made them like the dust by threshing [beneath one's feet].⁴ Now the rest of the acts of Jehoahaz, and all that he did, and his might, are they not written in
- 9 the book of the Chronicles of the kings of Israel? And Jehoahaz slept with his fathers; and they⁵ buried him in Samaria; and Joash his son reigned in his stead.
- 10 In the thirty and seventh year of Joash king of Judah began Jehoash the son of Jehoahaz to reign over Israel in Samaria, and reigned sixteen years.
- 11 And he did that which was evil in the sight of the Lord; he departed not from all the sins of Jeroboam the son of Nebat, who made Israel sin: but he walked
- 12 therein. And the rest of the acts of Joash, and all that he did, and his might, [.] wherewith [how] he fought against Amaziah king of Judah, are they not written in the book of the Chronicles of the kings of Israel? And Joash slept with his fathers; and Jeroboam sat upon his throne: and Joash was buried in Samaria with the kings of Israel.
- 14 Now Elisha was fallen sick of his sickness whereof he died [was to die].⁶ And Joash the king of Israel came down unto him, and wept over his face, and said, O my father, my father! the Chariot of Israel, and the Horsemen thereof!
- 15 And Elisha said unto him, Take bow and arrows. And he took unto him bow and arrows. And he said to the king of Israel, Put thine hand upon the bow. And he put his hand upon it: and Elisha put his hands upon the king's hands.
- 17 And he said, Open the window eastward. And he opened it. Then Elisha said, Shoot. And he shot. And he said, The [an] arrow of the Lord's [omit the Lord's] deliverance [for Jehovah], and the [an] arrow of deliverance from [against] Syria: for thou shalt smite the Syrians in Aphek, till thou have consumed them.⁷

18 And he said, Take the arrows. And he took them. And he said unto the 19 king of Israel, Smite upon the ground. And he smote thrice, and stayed. And the man of God was wroth with him, and said, Thou shouldest have smitten^a five or six times; then hadst thou smitten Syria till thou hadst consumed it: 20 whereas now thou shalt smite Syria but thrice. And Elisha died, and they buried him. And the [marauding] bands of the Moabites invaded the land at 21 the coming in [commencement] of the year. And it came to pass, as they were burying a man, that, behold, they spied a band of men [marauders]; and they cast the man into the sepulchre of Elisha: and when the man was let down [came], and touched the bones of Elisha, he revived, and stood up on his feet.
 22 But [Now] Hazael king of Syria [had] oppressed Israel all the days of Je-23 hoahaz, [.] And [but] the Lord was gracious unto them, and had compassion on them, and had respect unto [turned towards] them, because of his covenant with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and would not destroy them, neither cast he 24 them from his presence as yet. So Hazael king of Syria died; and Ben-hadad 25 his son reigned in his stead. And Jehoash the son of Jehoahaz took again out of the hand of Ben-hadad the son of Hazael the cities, which he had taken out of the hand of Jehoahaz his father by [in the] war. Three times did Joash beat him, and recovered the cities of Israel.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

^a Ver. 4.—[חָלָה אֶת־פָּנָי]. See 1 Kings xiii. 6.

^a Ver. 5.—[בְּתוֹמֹל שְׁלֹשׁוֹם], "as yesterday and day before," i. e., as before. Q. Gen. xxxi. 2, 5; Ex. v. 7, 14
 1 Sam. xxi. 6.

^a Ver. 6.—[The ℣ is omitted in the chetib on account of the ℣ which immediately follows. Q. 2 Sam. v. 2 1 Kings xxi. 21. Böttcher, §§ 414, and 1080, 1.

^a Ver. 7.—[בְּעָפָר לָרֶגֶל], literally "like dust to tread upon."

^a Ver. 9.—[וַיִּכְרְהוּ],—the plural, as in English, for the passive, equivalent to the active singular with indefinite subject. (Germ. man. Fr. on). Q. chap. vii. 18; 1 Kings i. 1; ix. 9; xviii. 10.

^a Ver. 14.—[The imperfect tense in לִיכֹלֵת has its proper force of the future, and is equivalent to the perfect of the Latin periphrastic conj. in rusa. Ewald, § 186, d.

^a Ver. 17.—[עַד־בִּכְרָה], lit. "until consuming," gerund form, = until thou consume, finish destroying, them.

^a Ver. 19.—[לְהַכּוֹת]; the infinitive is used like the Latin participle in dus: "It was to be smitten," i. e., thou shouldest have smitten. Ewald, § 287, a. In the conclusion we have a perfect in the sense of the pluperfect conjunctive.
Q. Gen. xviii. 12; 1 Sam. xiii. 18. Böttcher, § 947, d.—W. G. S.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 1. In the three and twentieth year of Joash. This chronological statement is not consistent with the one in ver 10: "In the thirty-seventh year of Joash." For, if Jehoahaz began to reign in the twenty-third year of Joash, and reigned for seventeen years, his son Jehoash cannot have followed in the thirty-seventh, but in the thirty-ninth, year of Joash of Judah. Again, if Jehoash of Israel became king in the thirty-seventh year of Joash of Judah, then his father Jehoahaz must have come to the throne in the twenty-first, and not in the twenty-third year of Joash of Judah. The old expositors sought to do away with this difficulty by assuming that Jehoash of Israel shared the throne for two years with his father Jehoahaz. This assumption, however, is untenable. Both for the general reasons assigned above (Pt. II., p. 88, e) and because it is clearly shown in vers. 9 and 10 that Jehoash did not ascend the throne until after the death of Jehoahaz, and that he had not shared his authority before that. Only one of the two numbers, 23 and 37, can be correct, as is now generally admitted; but the question, which is correct? receives various answers. We start again, as we did above (Pt. II., p. 86), from the established chronological starting-point,* 884 B. C., when Jehu became king of Israel, and Athaliah became queen of Judah. Jehu reigned 28 years (chap. x. 36), that is, from 884 to 856; his son Jehoahaz 17 years (chap. xiii. 1), from 856–839; Jehoash, 16 years (chap. xiii. 10), 839–823. Athaliah ruled 6 years, and Joash became king in the "seventh year" (chap. xi. 3, 4), that is, 884–877; Joash, 40 years (chap. xii. 2), 877–837; Amaziah, 29 years, 837–808. It follows that the twenty-third year of Joash of Judah, in which Jehoahaz became king of Israel, according to ver. 1, was the year 854, but this cannot be correct because his father Jehu ruled

* See the Appendix on the Chronology. For the purpose of the calculation here made, it is immaterial whether this date is correct or not, but it is certainly wrong to call it "an established chronological starting-point."—W. G. S.

28 years, and so died in 856. This would bring Jehoahaz' accession into the twenty-first, not the twenty-third, of Joash. This is the statement of Josephus: εικοστῷ δὲ καὶ πρώτῳ ἔτει τῆς Ἰωάσιν βασιλείας. The thirty-seventh year of Joash of Judah, in which, according to ver. 19, Jehoash of Israel became king, is the year 840; in the second year of Jehoash of Israel, that is, in the year 838, Amaziah became king of Judah (chap. xiv. 1). According to this reckoning, the death of Joash, the father of Amaziah, does indeed fall in 837, but, in view of the Jewish mode of reckoning which is explained Pt. II., p. 86 sq., a discrepancy of a single year has no significance. Josephus says, in agreement with ver. 10: ἐβδομον ἤδη καὶ τριακοστὸν ἔτος βασιλεύοντος Ἰωάσιν τῆς Ἰοιδα φυλῆς. If, on the other hand, we hold fast the "twenty-third year" in ver. 1, and, in ver. 10, read thirty-ninth for thirty-seventh, as Ewald, Thenius, and others desire, this thirty-ninth year will be 838, Jehu will only have 26 years, not 28 (chap. x. 36), and his son Jehoahaz' reign, extending from 854 to 838, will amount to 16, not 17 years (ver. 1); moreover, if Jehoash of Israel did not ascend the throne until 838, and Amaziah became king in Judah in his second year (chap. xiv. 1), then the latter did not become king until 836, though his father did not live, at the utmost, beyond 837. If thirty-seventh is changed into thirty-ninth, then all the other numbers must be changed, and this is inadmissible. If then we let these numbers stand, we must suppose that the words: "in the twenty-third year," in ver. 1, are either a copyist's error (כג for כז), or, that it is a mistake growing out of the confusion to which the Jewish mode of reckoning gave occasion (see above, Pt. II., p. 86 sq.). All the versions and all the editions have "thirty-seventh" except the Editio Aldina of the Sept. (1518), which has "thirty-ninth." Keil justly observes that this variant is "nothing but an unfortunate emendation, adopted in order to bring about a reconciliation, but without any critical value."

Ver. 3. And the anger of the Lord was kindled. The sense and the connection of vers. 3-7, are as follows: In the time of Jehu, who, contrary to all just expectations, clung to the calf-worship which Jeroboam had introduced, Jehovah had already commenced to "cut off" from Israel, and had given the land east of the Jordan into the hands of the Syrians (chap. x. 32 sq.). Since, however, Jehoahaz, Jehu's successor, did not take warning, but, on the contrary, during his reign the worship of the image of Astarte was once more introduced (1 Kings xiv. 15), so that the abolition of idolatry which had been accomplished was rendered ineffectual, God's anger (i. e., His justice, and His avenging, punishing, rigor) was kindled, so that one defeat followed upon another, until the might of Israel was reduced to a minimum. In his great distress, when he was on the brink of ruin, Jehoahaz at length turned to Jehovah, and besought Him, and the Lord, seeing the distress of His people, answered his prayer and sent a deliverer.—[That is the sense of the passage, but it does not account for the grammatical form and succession of the sentences. The best modern expositors agree with the English translators in making a parenthesis of vers. 5 and 6. The only question is as to where it is to begin, and it seems best, with Thenius and Bunsen, to enclose all after the first clause of ver. 4. The explanation then is as follows: Israel was defeated by the Syrians again and again during the reign of Jehoahaz. He turned in his distress to the Lord and sought him. There was no apparent response to this prayer during his lifetime, but the writer inserts a parenthesis to the effect that the prayer was nevertheless heard and answered, that God saw the distress of Israel and sent a champion for them, and yet that they persisted in their sins. The כִּי at the commencement of ver. 7 then presents no further difficulty. It refers back to the first clause of ver. 4. Jehoahaz besought the Lord, because He had left but, &c.—W. G. S.]—Ver. 3. All the days, i. e., of Jehoahaz, not of Hazael and Benhadad, as is clear from ver. 23 [also ver. 25 shows that, as a matter of fact, the success of the Syrians did not continue through "the days" of Benhadad.—W. G. S.].—Ver. 5. A savior, cf. Judges iii. 9, 15; Nehem. ix. 27. This was Jeroboam II., the grandson of Jehoahaz, as we see clearly from יְרֹבְאָם, chap. xiv.

27, which has an evident reference to מְנוּחָה in this verse. He completed what had already been begun by Jehoash, the son of Jehoahaz (ver. 25). Reference is here made to him in order to show that he was sent in answer to Jehoahaz' prayer, although he came so long afterwards. The words: they dwelt in their tents, describe the peaceful state of things which was brought about by the deliverer; in war they did not dwell in tents, but in strongholds and fortified places.—Ver. 6 contains a restriction of what has just been said in ver. 5. The peaceful state of things, which was brought about, was not a perfectly happy and satisfactory one, for the worship of Jeroboam's calves still continued, and even the worship of Asherah (the statue of Astarte) did not cease entirely. Thenius understands מְנוּחָה to mean that the worship of Asherah "very soon obtained a firm foothold" (i. e., under Jeroboam II.). Ewald also thinks that it was reintroduced at about his time. But the history of Jeroboam II., chap. xiv. 23-27, contains no mention of it, and also the כִּי in ver. 7 fixes the attention upon the time of Jehoahaz, when the incidents took place which are referred to in ver. 7. [This כִּי does not refer to ver. 6 at all. No connection can be established which will make good sense. It refers back to the first clause of ver. 4, as shown above. Bähr's interpretation, however, is correct, although it is difficult to understand, as Thenius says, how the Astarte-image survived Jehu's reformation. מְנוּחָה is better translated "stood," than "gained firm foothold." הַמִּשְׁכָּה has the article, and the form of statement of the first part of the verse is that the old apostasy of Jeroboam was still continued. If it had been intended to say that this old sin was continued, and that even the one which had been rooted up was reintroduced, it seems that some other word must have been used for מְנוּחָה which would have expressed this latter idea distinctly.—W. G. S.] Ver. 7 is a continuation of [the first clause of] ver. 4. It shows how far the "oppression" of the Syrians had gone. Dathe and Houbigant are in favor of placing it between vers. 4 and 5, but the close connection between these verses forbids this. [For he had left. The English translation: "Neither did he leave," cannot be defended. It is necessitated by the supposed connection between this clause and the last clause of ver. 4. It also seems to understand "the king of Syria" as the subject of וַיִּשְׁמַע, which does not make good sense. The subject of that verb is Jehovah, and the last half of ver. 7 repeats the same statement substituting "the king of Syria" (who was the instrument by which it was accomplished), in the place of the ultimate agent. The passage may now be made clear, if we get rid of the parenthesis by putting ver. 7 between the first and second clauses of ver. 4, as follows: Jehoahaz besought the Lord, for He (the Lord) had left but . . . for the king of Syria had destroyed them . . . and the Lord hearkened unto him, seeing the distress, and gave a deliverer, who delivered them, yet they persisted in their sins.—W. G. S.] The expression עָפָר לְרֹגְלַיִם does not mean chaff, as Luther understands it, for עָפָר is not dust which floats in the air, but dust which lies upon the ground and is trodden under foot. The fundamental meaning of עָפָר is, to tread under foot (Hab. iii. 12; Micah iv. 13). There is no reference to the barbarous usage of war referred to in Amos i. 3; 2 Sam. xii. 31. [Literally the English for the words would be: dust for treading, i. e., dust which lies beneath one's feet (see Grammatical note on the verse). It is an expression for utter defeat and destruction. They were reduced to utter helplessness and powerlessness. Thénius thinks that it refers to a definite defeat, and Hitzig, on Amos iv. 10, suggests that the reference there may be to the same decisive defeat here alluded to.—W. G. S.]—On ver. 10 see notes on ver. 1. Jehoash's war with Amaziah, mentioned in ver. 12, is narrated at length in chap. xiv. 8 sq. The concluding formula, vers. 12 and 13, belongs properly after ver. 25. It is given in this place only because it followed, in one of the authorities used by the author, directly upon vers. 10 and 11, and he did not consider it necessary to dis sever it from this connection.

Ver. 14. Now Elisha was fallen sick, &c. The narrative in vers. 14 to 21 is, without doubt, taken from a different original document from that to which the verses belong which immediately precede and follow. It is not inserted here merely because it belongs to the time of king Jehoash. The end of the great prophet of Israel, who had wrought so influentially upon its history, and whose acts had been so circumstantially narrated, could not be passed over in silence, especially since the accompanying incidents stood in such close connection with what had gone before, and with what was to follow. Jehoahaz had, according to vers. 3-7, left the kingdom very much weakened. When Jehoash heard of Elisha's illness, he went to him, and, weeping, called to him, as Elisha had once called to Elijah as he passed away (see Pt. II., p. 15, and cf. p. 69): O my father, my father! the Chariot of Israel and the Horsemen thereof! as much as to say: If now thou also, who hast so often shown thyself the strength and the protector of Israel, and hast helped by counsel and by act, if now thou also, in this time of distress, art about to depart, whence shall come help, and counsel, and deliverance from the hand of the powerful enemy? This humble and chastened spirit on his part leads the prophet to give him the declaration that the prayer of his father (ver. 4) had been heard, and that the deliverance should commence in his time. The fulfilment of this promise is then narrated in the following verses, 22-25.

Ver. 15. And Elisha said unto him, &c. Elisha does not simply make known this promise to the king by words, but also, as a prophet, in that form which belongs to the essential character of the prophetic office, and is peculiar to prophetic announcements, that is, by means of a symbolic action (see note on chap. 11, 30 sq.). The declaration thereby receives the impress of a solemn and purely prophetic announcement. Here, as in all similar cases, the symbolic action precedes the words which explain it; thereby it represents the future event as a fact, as something which will come without fail. Inasmuch as it was the king himself who performed this symbolic action, and not the prophet, it became all the more a pledge to him of the fulfilment of the prophet's words. The whole transaction consists of two acts; vers. 15-17 give the first one; vers. 18 and 19 the second, which is a continuation of the first. Each is followed by words of the prophet, interpreting it. Ver. 15. Take bow and arrows. The prophet made use of these for his symbolic action, because the matter in hand was a warlike contest with enemies, and the king, or at least his attendants, were provided with these arms. The command: "Take bow and arrows," signifies: Arm thyself for war against the Syrians! There is not the least reference to a method of soothsaying by means of arrows (Belomancy, cf. Ezek. xxi. 21), which was practised by many ancient heathen nations.—Ver. 16. Put thine hand upon the bow; literally: Let thine hand ride upon the bow. In drawing the bow, it is held in a horizontal position in such a way that the left hand rests upon it. The prophet placed his hands upon those of the king "in token that the impulse which was to be given came, through the prophet's hands, from the Lord" (Keil). The king's act thereby becomes to a certain extent the act of the prophet, and so an act which is performed in the name and by the authority of Jehovah. Only in so far as the laying on of hands here be regarded as at once a consecration and a blessing, for that is not its primary significance here, as it is in other places where the hand is laid upon the head.—Ver. 17. Open the window, that is, order the grating, which is in front of the window-opening, to be removed. The king could not open it himself, for he had both hands upon the bow. Eastward, i. e., toward the country east of the Jordan, which the Syrians had taken (chap. x. 38), and from whence they continually threatened the country this side the Jordan. The older expositors refer, by way of explanation of the words: And he shot, to the custom in ancient times of declaring war by shooting an arrow into the enemy's territory (Virgil, Æneid, ix. 57), but that was not the significance of the arrow shot by the king in this case. The words which explain the symbolic act follow the discharge of the arrow: An arrow of deliverance for Jehovah, וְחֵץ לְיְהוָה, i. e., auctore Jehova. [The expression seems intended to interpret the arrow, thus discharged, on two sides, towards Jehovah, and towards the Syrians. It was an arrow of deliverance for, or in its relation to Jehovah, inasmuch as it represented the deliverance which He was determined to give; it was an arrow of deliverance against or upon the Syrians, as it signified the coming overthrow of their oppression.—W. G. S.] Let this arrow be a pledge to thee that Jehovah will help thee, and that thou wilt overcome the Syrians—at Aphek. Locus erat boni ominis (Menochius), for Jehovah had already once given Israel a great victory there (1 Kings xx. 26–28). The words עֶרֶב-בֵּלָה refer, in this verse, only to the Syrian army at Aphek; in ver. 19, on the contrary, they refer to the entire Syrian military power.

Ver. 18. Take the arrows. The second part of the symbolical action which here begins not only continues the preceding, but consists of an enhancement of it. The article in הַחֲצִיצִים, which is wanting in ver. 15, designates particular arrows, namely all, besides the one which had already been shot away, which remained in the quiver. הָרָצָה does not mean: Smite the earth (Luther); nor: Smite upon the earth (De Wette); still less: Strike with the bundle of arrows in the direction of the earth [i. e., as if smiting an enemy to earth with it] (Thenius). The last interpretation has no support in the text; and arrows are not used for smiting enemies to the earth, or for striking upon the ground. נָכָה stands in contrast with יָרָה (ver. 17); it does not mean jacere (sagittas), to shoot arrows, but, ferire, to hit (1 Kings xxii. 34; 2 Kings ix. 24; 1 Sam. xvii. 49). The arrow in ver. 17 was only to be shot away through the window towards the east; the arrows in ver. 18 were to hit down to the earth, i. e., in such a way that what was hit by them should be stretched upon the ground. As the king only shot to the earth thus three times and then stopped, did not, therefore, use up all the arrows which remained, the prophet was displeased (Sept. ἐλεεινός) and said (ver. 19): Thou shouldest have smitten, &c. He meant: Thou hadst more than three arrows, and mightest have continued to hit; the fact, however, that thou hast ceased so soon, shows that thou lackest the zeal which is tireless, and which perseveres, trusting in the Lord; thou shalt indeed defeat the Syrians, but the complete destruction of their power will not come about through thee. The reason why the king shot three times and then stopped was that, according to the prevalent notion, that what was done thrice was done perfectly (Numb. xxii. 28, 32, 33; xxiv. 10; Ex. xxiii. 17), he supposed that this sufficed. It was not because he was afraid that, if he shot any more, the prophecies of Elisha would not come to pass (Starke), or because he did not dare to shoot more, "lest too extravagant demands might deprive him of all" (Von Gerlach). In the first part of the transaction (vers. 16 and 17), it is promised him that Jehovah will give him victory over the Syrians; in the second (vers. 18 and 19), he is exhorted to go on, trusting in Jehovah's assistance, without hesitation, and putting forth all his energies, and so to make war upon the Syrians until he utterly destroys them.

Ver. 20. And Elisha died, &c., מָתָה evidently refers back to יָמָת in ver. 14. Vulg.: Mortuus est ergo Elisaeus et sepelierunt eum. This sentence closes the narrative which began with ver. 14. It ought not, therefore, to be treated as a subordinate clause to what follows, as Luther understood it: "When Elisha was dead and they had buried him, the Moabites made an incursion." Elisha must have reached a great age, for Jehoash did not come to the throne till 840–39, and Ahab, in whose reign Elisha was already a grown man (1 Kings xix. 19), reigned from 919–897 (see above, Pt. II., p. 45). According to Jerome's statement (Epist. Paulae), Elisha's grave was in the neighborhood of Samaria, where he had a residence (chap. v. 9; vi. 32). Krummacher locates it, without any definite reason, in the neighborhood of Jericho, and certainly raiding bands of the Moabites might much more naturally appear in the neighborhood of Jericho than near Samaria. קָם שָׁנָה means literally: a year came. According to the Targum and the Rabbis this means: at the beginning of the year. They came at this season because then the country furnished pasture. It can hardly mean that they came every year (Ewald). Still less correct is the rendering of the Vulg. which Luther follows: in ipso anno, in the same year.—וַתִּשְׁלֹךְ, ver. 21, is not to be understood of a rude and violent "throwing in," but it is meant to describe the haste with which they opened the grave and deposited the corpse in it. It is not necessary to change וַתִּשְׁלֹךְ, as Hitzig and Thenius do, into וַתֵּלֶכְהוּ, i. e., they went away, for הֵלֵךְ "is used not only of the motion of lifeless objects, but also of the gradual progress of an action" (Keil). [It has great dramatic force, describing the gradual approach of the corpse to that contact which involved such momentous consequences.—W. G. S.] The Hebrews brought their dead to the grave, not in closed coffins, but on an open bier (Winer, R.-W.-B., ii. s. 16), "so that the corpse which was being brought to the sepulchre, on being hastily deposited there, might easily come in contact with the remains of Elisha" (Keil).

Ver. 22. But Hazael, king of Syria, &c. The narrative here returns to vers. 3–11. Seb. Schmidt: reassumitur hoc de Chazael ad exponendum complementum prophetiae Elisae. In sense, לָחַץ is to be taken as a pluperfect. Ver. 23 contains a remark of the author: Israel had been brought by Hazael to the brink of ruin, but, for the sake of His covenant, Jehovah took pity upon His people once more: He did not as yet permit it to be destroyed, as He did later (chap. xvii. 6). Hazael died (ver. 24), and Jehoash defeated his son and successor three times, as the prophet had foretold. The cities of Israel (ver. 25) which Jehoash took away from Benhadad must have been "those which lay upon this side the Jordan, for Hazael had conquered the territory beyond Jordan during the reign of Jehu (chap. x. 32 sq.), and it is expressly stated that the cities which he now recovered were those which had been taken from his father Jehoahaz" (Thenius). Jeroboam II. was the first who restored the ancient boundaries (chap. xiv. 25).

HISTORICAL AND ETHICAL.

1. In regard to the reign of King Jehoahaz, we have but scanty records; the Chronicle does not mention him at all. The kingdom had declined very much during the last years of Jehu (chap. x. 31-33), but, under this king, it sank still lower in every respect. The worship of the calves, which his father had retained, still continued; also the licentious worship of Astarte was once more practised. The entire revolution mentioned in chaps. ix. and x., the overthrow of the House of Ahab, the foundation of a new dynasty, the abolition of idolatry, thus proved fruitless and vain. The divine judgments and chastisements which had begun under Jehu therefore increased, so that the kingdom came nigh to ruin. Jehoahaz, therefore, turned and prayed to God in anxiety and despair, and He once more had pity on His people. Schlier justly says of Jehoahaz: "His prayer was the best thing that he bequeathed to his successor." The state of things during his reign is a proof that worship of images always leads to worship of false gods, and that there is only one step from the one to the other (see 1 Kings xii. 25-33, Hist. § 2). It shows how, universally, the weeds of religious error, when they have taken root amongst a people, although they may be pulled up again and again, nevertheless strike root again and spread, and endure more storm and hard usage than good and useful plants. Is it not true that even Christian nations cling more stubbornly to the errors which have fastened upon Christian doctrine, than to Christian truth itself? On the other hand, God, who guides the destinies of Israel, appears here as one whose wrath is indeed kindled at the sin and apostasy of His people, but who does not remain angry forever. He never ceases to be pitiful and gracious, kind and faithful (Ex. xxxiv. 6; Ps. ciii. 8-9). When His people call upon Him, He hears the cry, and in due time sends a deliverer.

2. There is no mention made of the prophet Elisha from the anointing of Jehu in 884 to the reign of Jehoash (839), that is, for a period of at least forty-five years, whereas we should have expected that his influence would be especially wide and great under a dynasty which he put upon the throne. The fact that Jehoash called him "Father" and the "Chariot of Israel and the Horsemen thereof" shows that he enjoyed high honor and esteem, and it would be very astonishing, if Elisha had not even given a sign of his existence for forty-five years. We are therefore compelled to infer either that the original documents used by our author were silent in regard to his activity, or that some of the incidents mentioned in chap. iv. sq. belong to this period (see Pt. II., p. 45). It cannot be proved, as Ewald asserts, that "all the incidents, in which he appears as standing in high estimation with the king of the northern kingdom, belong to the times of the house of Jehu," that is to say, especially chaps. v. and vi. It is far more probable that it was he who warned and threatened king Jehu (chap. x. 30), and also induced king Jehoahaz to humble himself and turn to God in prayer (ver. 4). He shows himself once more on his death-bed in his full and distinctive prophetic character. He appears here in his last hours in the character which was peculiar to him as compared with Elijah, i. e., as the one who built up, rescued from distress, and preserved (see Pt. II., p. 24). He departs from the world with a great promise of deliverance to his people, with the announcement of coming release from the oppression of the arch-enemy. "Salvation and Victory from Jehovah!" is his last prophetic oracle. While the young and vigorous king, despairing of deliverance, stands crushed and tearful before him, the prophet, oppressed by disease, and age, and approaching death, raises himself up from his death-bed, spiritually full of life and strength, and gives orders to the king to do this and that, in the tone of one who has set up and deposed kings, and whose calling it has been to break in pieces and to destroy, to build and to plant (Jer. i. 10). He commands the king to execute the significant operation, not because he himself was too weak to talk much (Thenius), but because the king was to be the actor, was to be filled with courageous faith, and was to be assured of the victory he should win. It must have made a deep and solemn impression upon him and upon all who stood about, that he himself executed this symbolic action with the hands of the prophet laid upon him. When the prophet's wrath was kindled against the king for desisting from shooting, it was not a sinful ebullition, but a wrath which sprang from love, because the king did not secure still more of the promise for himself and his people.

3. The story of the restoration to life of a man who was laid in Elisha's grave stands in close connection with what precedes, not only historically, but also as respects its significance, and its moral. This is sufficient to show that it cannot have, as Ephraim Syrus and some other church fathers suppose, the general moral, that "Elisha, even in the grave, surpassed Elijah in miraculous power," nor, as Theodoret says: ὡς διαπλάσιον τοῦ διδασκάλου τὴν χάριν ἐδίφατο [that he had a double portion of his master's spirit]. This notion rests upon the erroneous interpretation of chap. ii. 9 (see notes thereon). Elisha is nowhere placed superior to Elijah. According to the opinion which is now generally received, and which was proposed by Seb. Smith, the object of this miracle of resuscitation was to "impress the seal of the Divine confirmation upon the prediction of the dying prophet in regard to Jehoash's victory over the Syrians" (Keil), or, "to give a pledge of the fulfilment of the promise which had been given" (Thenius). But the resuscitation of a dead man has no essential connection with the contents of this prediction, and the miracle would then be a mere display of supernatural power, having no special significance, and presenting no reason why this rather than any other form of supernatural work should have been chosen. The incident is connected, not with the victory over the Syrians, but with the death and burial of the prophet, which are mentioned just before. Its significance is this: Elisha died and was buried as all men are, but even in the grave testimony was borne to his character as a prophet and servant of God. The spirit (רוח) of Jehovah, which made him, as well as his master, prophets (chap. ii. 9, 15), and which is the principle of all prophetic life and work, made itself manifest in him even in the grave. It manifested itself, moreover, in a manner which corresponds exactly to the form of activity of this prophet, who was a preserver, savior, and life-giver (see Pt. II., p. 24). Salvation and life proceed from him, by the spirit of God, which makes alive, and is the fountain of life (Ezek. xxxvii. 1-14; Hoa.

vi. 2; Deut. xxvii. 39), even after he is in the grave. This interpretation is confirmed by the passage Sirach xlviii. 1-15. The praises of the great prophets Elijah and Elisha are there pronounced, and especial reference is made to the end of each. The translation of Elijah is mentioned in ver. 9, and then, in ver. 13, with which the panegyric of Elisha begins, the author refers back to it again: "Elijah was enveloped in a storm-cloud, and Elisha was filled with his spirit. During his life he feared before no ruler, and no one ever imposed restraint upon him: He yielded to no compulsion, καὶ ἐν κοιμῇσιν ἐπροφήτευσεν τὸ σῶμα αὐτοῦ. During his life he performed wonders, καὶ ἐν τελευτῇ θαυμάσια τὰ ἔργα αὐτοῦ." Whereas, in vers. 1-8, Elijah's separate deeds are particularly described, Elisha's activity is only delineated in general outline; on the contrary his end, like that of Elijah, is noticed especially. This shows that, in the time of Sirach, this incident was considered important and significant. Taken in connection with the context the sense is: as the greatest of all prophets, Elijah, the second Moses, was marvelously glorified at the close of his career; so was his successor, Elisha, also. Though his end was not like that of his master, yet it was not without divine testimony to his prophetic calling, for the spirit of Jehovah made itself manifest in him even in the grave. It was not the dead bones which brought the dead to life, but the living God. The resurrection of the dead man was only "brought about by contact with the bones of the dead prophet, because God desired thereby to show to His people that the divine energy, which had been active in Elisha, had not, by his death, disappeared from Israel" (Keil Commentar, Ed. of 1845). This shows that it is as great an error to charge the writer with ascribing to the bones of Elisha a magical, miraculous power, as to refer to this narrative as a proof of the miraculous efficacy of relics. "This instance," says Starke, "proves nothing in behalf of the relics of saints and their misuse in the Romish Church, for it was not the bones of Elisha, but the power of God, which made this dead man live. The Church did not then, and has never since, dug up the bones of Elisha, much less encased them in gold and silver, and given them to the people to kiss and reverence, as is done under the papacy, in order to gain favor with God, for which there is neither precept nor example in the Scriptures." Neither is it necessary to have recourse to the typical and allegorical method of interpretation. J. Lange says: "The chief object (of this miracle) was to affirm the doctrine of the future, universal resurrection of the dead. Elisha was, therefore, in this point, a type of Christ." In like manner, Krummacher says, basing his view on Sir. xlviii. 13, that the corpse of Elisha prophesied of the "flowing, new-creating, life-giving, miraculous power, which was to be poured out in the world through the death of his great anti-type, Jesus Christ." This latter notion is inapt, because life and resurrection proceed, not from the crucified and dead, but from the risen, Christ. Cassel (Der Prophet Elisa, s. 162 sq.) even finds the prophetic spirit represented in the (dead) Elisha, and the people of Israel in the dead man restored to life. He says: "When the spirit of the prophets breathed over Israel like an evening wind, then the nation rose again, became living, and made all live whom its word touched. All the dead who fall upon prophecy rise again to life.

Elisha is the prophetic law, whosoever in Israel believes on it experiences the resurrection of the dead in Jesus Christ. The miracle at Elisha's grave is a type—but since all, Jews and heathen, alike become living at the grave of Christ through repentance and faith, no dead man's bone any longer restores to life." It is not necessary to show that such interpretations have no foundation in the text. [Scarcely a better means of exposing their frivolity could be found than to translate them. They are inflated, rhetorical inventions. When they are translated literally, they appear to be scarcely more than ridiculous and incoherent jargon. The principal utility of quoting them is to keep before us a warning of the pitfalls which environ the science of interpretation.—W. G. S.] Finally, the naturalistic interpretation of this incident, according to which "an apparently dead man, when he was thrown into the grave of Elisha, was restored to life by the violent shock of the fall" (Exeget. Handbuch on the passage; Baur, Hebr. Mythologie, ii. s. 197; Jahn, Einleitung in's A. T. ii. 1. s. 261) may be regarded as antiquated and abandoned. Thenius says: "The incident may have occurred very naturally," but does not tell how. Knobel's remark: There is something analogous in the legend that the ground, where Amphiarus lay buried, prophesied (Cicero, De Divin. i. 40), rests upon an entire misconception of the aim and significance of the miracle.

[This might be regarded as a test case among the Old Testament miracles. It is very doubtful if many readers will find themselves satisfied with the above discussion of it. The notion that Elisha was a "constructive" prophet, in contrast with Elijah, who was "destructive," is a mere whim. The fondness for historical parallels and contrasts seduces many into finding coincidences, correspondences, and contrasts where none exist out of the imagination of the writer. Elijah and Elisha differed somewhat in character, it is true, but they must be taken together as two men who worked with the same general method, under very similar circumstances, and towards the same ends. There is no ground for any such contrast as is here affirmed. Yet this contrast is made to be, in Bähr's explanation of the miracle, after all verbiage is stripped from it, the motive of this wonderful event. God bore testimony to Elisha's calling even after his death, and this testimony took the form of the restoration of a dead man to life by physical contact with the bones of the dead prophet, because Elisha had been a constructing, life-giving prophet. Of course, an affirmed miracle would not be disproved, if we did not see the necessity for it, but no miracle recorded in Scripture would seem more superfluous than one which was intended to ratify the calling of Elisha as a prophet of Jehovah, after his death. As for the authority of Sirach, it is not worth while to go into it. His panegyric is poetical and rhetorical in form, and when he says, for instance, that "the body (of Elisha) prophesied in the tomb," although there is a reference to this passage, and although it is a perfectly justifiable thing for him to refer to it in this poetical strain in the course of such a composition as that he was making, yet it is difficult to see how these words could be reduced to any statement which would be available for critical and exegetical purposes. The attempts to lend significance to this incident, on one side and on the other, are all failures. The simple statement of the text is that an incursion of Moabites interrupted a funeral. The corpse was hastily thrown into the sepulchre of Elisha, and when it touched the bones of the prophet, the man returned to life. The remarkable dramatic minuteness of the description in ver. 21: "when the dead man came and touched the bones of the prophet, he revived," shows that the resuscitation was dependent on, and, we may say, caused by the physical contact, according to the conviction of the writer of the narrative. Different persons will receive this story in different ways, according to their theological and philosophical prepossessions. Some will see in it a popular legend or myth which insisted on glorifying the prophet by ascribing miraculous efficacy to his bones after his death, a mere legend which grew up in the course of time, but had no historical foundation. Others will simply take the story as it is given as an indisputable fact, and will go no farther than the record goes. It is not stated that the bones of the prophet were ever tested again to see if they would repeat the miracle, or that any other persons than this one were ever restored, and it is not stated why the miracle was performed at all. Those who adopt this second course must decline to speculate on these questions. They must assume that, for some reasons unknown, God, on a single occasion, attached to the bones of the prophet this efficacy. They must decline to deduce general inferences from this incident. Others again will go still farther, and infer that the sanctity of the man was due to the indwelling of the Holy Spirit, that this became physically inherent in the remains of his body, that his bones, therefore, had miraculous efficacy, and that the bones of other individuals of equal sanctity will have equal efficacy. It is a development and extension of the second view, and it elevates the isolated instance into a law. In this way the story is made to lend support to the use of relics. It is remarked above, in reference to this, that it was not the prophet's bone, but the power of God, which wrought the miracle. No one would assert anything else of the use of any relic. It is clearly stated that the resuscitation depended upon the physical contact with the physical object, and the latter had mysterious and supernatural efficacy inherent in it, which it could only have acquired as part of the body of a man who had been marked by extraordinary spiritual superiority. That, however, is the principle which lies at the root of the use and veneration of relics.—W. G. E.]

4. King Jehoash did not indeed renounce the worship of Jeroboam's calves, but he was one of the best among the kings of the northern kingdom. This much is clear from the story of his interview with Elisha, if from nothing more. We do not hear that any other one of the four kings, under whom the prophet lived, stood in similar relations to him. Even though the tears which he shed at the prophet's death-bed were not tears of penitence, and of a "lively regret for his past behavior towards the prophet" (Krummacher), yet they certainly show how deeply he was touched by the distress of Israel, and how helpless he felt at the departure of the prophet. By his exclamation: "My Father!" &c., he proclaimed to all who stood by that the prophet was more to him than all the military force which still remained. He then goes on to do what the prophet commands him, as a servant obeys his master. He desisted after shooting three times, not, as Krummacher thinks, from fear of condescending below his royal dignity, but from shame and fear of demanding too much [or rather, because what was done three times was thought to be completely done. See Exeg. note on ver. 19.] He took courage, and soon showed himself a bold and victorious soldier, both in his war with Syria, and in that with Amaziah (see chap. xiv.).

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Vers. 1-13. See Histor. and Eth. The history of the kingdom of Israel under Jehoahaz shows us (a) God's severity, and (b) God's goodness. Rom. xi. 22; cf. Sirach v. 6 sq.; xvi. 12.—STARKS: Men who have a personal interest in deeply rooted customs or traditions, are very loath to see them overthrown and abandoned, although they often thereby draw down God's judgments by their own hands.—Vers. 3 and 4. How hard it often is to bring a man, who has turned away from the living God and from His word, to seek the Lord's face. Jehoahaz had to be pushed to the last extremity by the enemy, and to be most deeply humiliated, before he called upon the Lord and saw where help is to be found in all distress (Isai. xvi. 16).—Vers. 4 and 5. BIBLE: The Lord heard him and thereby showed distinctly how easily He may be moved to show mercy, if we will only bring ourselves to ask Him in humility and sincere penitence.—STARKS: Faithful Christian! If God heard Jehoahaz, how much more will He hear thee, if thou callest upon Him.—The Lord gave Israel a deliverer, but Jehoahaz did not live to see him. God hears the cries of those who earnestly call upon Him, and helps them, but the time and place and manner of His aid are retained in His own discretion. Do not despair if thy prayer does not seem to be heard, and the Lord delays His assistance. He knows the fitting seasons and knows what is useful for us.—Vers. 5 and 6. The Lord gave Israel a temporal saviour in its hour of physical need; to us He has given a spiritual Saviour, who can and will save us out of the hands of the greatest of all enemies: sin, death, Satan, and Hell (Luke i. 69-71). What can we expect, if it must be said of us also: Yet they did not renounce their sins.—RIECHTER: Many a one prays, like Jehoahaz, in his time of distress, and when the trouble is past, the good impulses quickly disappear again. Ver. 7. WÜRT. SUMM.: No nation is so great and mighty that God cannot take away its might and make it so small and slight that it is only like dust which the wind scatters (Ps. xviii. 42). Therefore, ye godless! plume yourselves not so much upon your strength (Ps. lxxv. 5). Look at the chaff, how quickly it is scattered; so shall it be with your strength. Vers. 14-21. Elisha's End. (a) His death-bed, vers. 14-19. (b) His grave, vers. 20-21. Vers. 14-17. KRUMMACHER: The sick-bed. (a) Elisha in illness; (b) bewailed by the king; (c) but a prophet until his latest breath.—Vers. 14-19. King Jehoash at the death-bed of Elisha. (a) He weeps and laments; (b) He is consoled and strengthened.—How did Elisha pass away from earth? Sick and weakened by age—(his lot was the ordinary one of mortals; he also had to pass away into darkness and death, however much he had wrought and fought and labored, Ps.

xc. 10 and 12. God has ordained sickness before death, that we may set our house in order, may seek refuge in the mercy of God, and may ponder what is our sole consolation, in life and in death)—yet, as a man of God. (In spite of weakness and physical decay, he is strong and firm; he asks no help from men, but he, the dying one, consoles and strengthens the living. His last word is a promise of victory. The words of Isaiah [xl. 29–31] are verified in him.)—Ver. 14. It is rarely recognized how great and irreparable is the loss of a true man of God, a great benefactor, and a faithful servant, until he is gone.—King Jehoash was not ashamed to come to the dying prophet, and to confess with tears his own helplessness; but how many shun such holy men, and are glad if they never need have anything to do with them.—Ver. 15 sq. From the example of Elisha, we see how one who can say: "The Lord is my strength and song, and is become my salvation" (Ps. cxviii. 14), stands before the gates of eternity; proclaiming salvation, extending blessings, sure of victory. There is no greater thing than a man who, in the face of death, can cry: "O death! where is thy sting," &c. (1 Cor. xv. 55, 57).—KRUMMACHER: Here we see Elisha's patriotism. If we would know what true love of one's fatherland is, let us ask the prophet. In his case it received a divine consecration. It is truly touching to see with what tenderness the prophets enfold in their hearts their country and people, even when they see in them little but spiritual death, decay, and corruption, and experience from their fellow-countrymen little but bitterness, hate, and persecution.—Vers. 18–19. BERLEB. BIBEL: Cease not to shoot arrows of love into the heart of God, so shall one arrow of deliverance after another come back to thee from the Lord, and be given to thee in the word of truth. So shalt thou smite thy spiritual foes and tread them under foot even more completely than Jehoash did the Syrians.—ROOS: The cowardly unbelief of men causes that God cannot reveal His glory in some places as he gladly would (Mark vi. 5), and that their way is not made so easy for them as God would be willing to make it (Prov. iv. 12). The measure of the victory depends upon the measure of the faith. The Lord said to the centurion of Capernaum: "As thou hast believed, so be it done unto thee" (Matt. viii. 13). He who is called to execute a work for God may not stop and desist according to his own good judgment, but must go on in it tirelessly and faithfully, till the Lord commands him to cease.—CALW. BIBEL: Many enemies are to be conquered, many tests to be endured.

Faith must hold firm until the end. When one battle is won, the conflict is not over. How much is it to be regretted when one only half believes, half obeys, or when one, after a good beginning, desists.

Vers. 20 and 21. The Miracle at the Grave of Elisha; its Object and its Significance, (a) for the prophet himself; (b) for us all (see Hist. § 3). VON GERLACH: The Lord showed thereby that He was not a God of the dead, but of the living; that the dead in Him live for Him (Matt. xxii. 32); that the spirit of life which proceeds from Him spreads life and blessing everywhere where it comes, and that it is superior to death and decay.—The dead cannot make the dead to live; the spirit of the Lord alone penetrates even into the place of corruption, and changes it into a place of life (Ezek. xxxvii. 1 sq.). We, therefore, rest our confidence and hope, not upon dead men's bones, but upon the God who makes all things to live, and who raised up from the dead the great Shepherd of the sheep. If we are buried with Him, we have this consolation: the God who raised Him will also raise us to life through His might (1 Cor. vi. 14; 2 Cor. iv. 14; Col. ii. 12; Rom. vi. 4).—BERLEB. BIBEL: The precept and example of men of God can have power, even after their death, to the resurrection of those who are spiritually dead, if the latter will only study and follow them (Hebr. xiii. 7). This is the way in which the bones of the dead are truly efficacious. If thou art dead in sin, cast thyself into the tomb of the Saviour in humility and self-renunciation, so shalt thou revive and rise to life again as He did, for he who truly grasps the virtue of the death of Christ (comes into contact with that Dead One) is thus revived to the true life of his soul.

Ver. 23 sq. CALW. BIBEL: When God turns Himself from us, then we are given over to wretchedness; when He turns back to us again, then we find salvation. Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob had been dead for a thousand years, and yet their blessing was efficacious.—WÜRT. SUMM.: God does not take pleasure in our ruin, but remembers, even in the midst of His anger, His promised grace and the covenant which He has made with us (Luke i. 72 sq.).—CRAMER: Tyrants are rods by means of which God chastises His people; but finally the tyrants themselves are chastised by God and cast into the fire.—Ver. 25. STARRK: It was unjustly obtained and quickly lost. Unrighteous wealth rarely comes to the third generation (Jes. xxxiii. 1).—RICHTER: Israel is to-day, as it was then (ver. 23), a covenant people of God, and is not rejected entirely and forever (Rom. xi.).

B.—The Reign of Amaziah in Judah, and that of Jeroboam II. in Israel.

CHAP. XIV. 1–29. (2 CHRON. XXV.)

- 1 IN THE second year of Joash son of Jehoahaz king of Israel reigned [came]
- 2 reigned] Amaziah the son of Joash king of Judah [became king]. He was twenty and five years old when he began to reign, and [he] reigned twenty and nine years in Jerusalem. And his mother's name was Jehoaddan of Jerusalem.
- 3 And he did that which was right in the sight of the Lord, yet not like David his father: he did according to [in] all things as Joash his father did [had done].

4 Howbeit the high places were not taken away: as yet [omit as yet] the people did sacrifice [were yet sacrificing¹] and burnt [burning] incense on the high places.

5 And it came to pass, as soon as the kingdom was confirmed in his hand, that
6 he slew his servants which had slain the king his father. But the children of the murderers he slew not: according unto that which is written in the book of the law of Moses, wherein [which] the Lord commanded, saying, The fathers shall not be put to death for the children, nor the children be put to death for 7 the fathers: but every man shall be put to death [die²] for his own sin. He slew of Edom in the valley of salt ten thousand, [·] and [omit and—He also] took Selah by war, and called the name of it Joktheel unto this day.

8 Then Amaziah sent messengers to Jehoash, the son of Jehoahaz son of Jehu,
9 king of Israel, saying, Come, let us look one another in the face.' And Jehoash the king of Israel sent to Amaziah king of Judah, saying, The thistle [brier] that was in Lebanon sent to the cedar that was in Lebanon, saying, Give thy daughter to my son to wife: and there passed by a wild beast that was in Lebanon,
10 and trode down the thistle [brier]. Thou hast indeed smitten Edom, and thine heart hath lifted thee up: glory of this [exult!], and tarry at home: for why shouldest [wilt] thou meddle to thy hurt [provoke a calamity], that thou
11 shouldest fall, even thou, and Judah with thee? But Amaziah would not hear. Therefore Jehoash king of Israel went up; and he and Amaziah king of Judah
12 looked one another in the face at Beth-shemesh, which belongeth [belongeth] to Judah. And Judah was put to the worse before Israel: and they fled every man
13 to their [his] tents [tent]. And Jehoash king of Israel took Amaziah king of Judah, the son of Jehoash the son of Ahaziah, at Beth-shemesh, and came³ to Jerusalem, and brake down the wall of Jerusalem from the gate of Ephraim unto 14 the corner gate, four hundred cubits. And he took all the gold and silver, and all the vessels that were found in the house of the Lord, and in the treasures of the king's house, and hostages,⁴ and returned to Samaria.

15 Now the rest of the acts of Jehoash which he did, and his might, and how he fought with Amaziah king of Judah, are they not written in the book of the 16 Chronicles of the kings of Israel? And Jehoash slept with his fathers, and was buried in Samaria with the kings of Israel; and Jeroboam his son reigned in his stead.

17 And Amaziah the son of Joash king of Judah lived after the death of Jehoash son of Jehoahaz king of Israel fifteen years. And the rest of the acts of 18 Amaziah, are they not written in the book of the Chronicles of the kings of Judah? Now they made a conspiracy against him in Jerusalem: and he fled 19 to Lachish; but they sent after him to Lachish, and slew him there. And they brought him on horses: and he was buried at Jerusalem with his fathers in the city of David.

21 And all the people of Judah took Azariah, which [who] was sixteen years
22 old, and made him king instead of his father Amaziah. He built Elath, and restored it to Judah, after that the king slept with his fathers.

23 In the fifteenth year of Amaziah the son of Joash king of Judah, Jeroboam the son of Joash king of Israel began to reign in Samaria, and reigned forty and 24 one years. And he did that which was evil in the sight of the Lord: he departed not from all the sins of Jeroboam the son of Nebat, who made Israel to 25 sin. He restored the coast of Israel from the entering of [near⁵] Hamath unto the sea of the plain, according to the word of the Lord God of Israel, which he spake by the hand of his servant Jonah, the son of Amittai, the prophet, which 26 was of Gath-hepher. For the Lord saw the affliction of Israel, that it was very bitter:⁶ for there was not any shut up, nor any left [neither any of age, nor any 27 under age], nor any helper for Israel. And the Lord said not that he would blot out the name of Israel from under heaven: but he saved them by the hand
28 of Jeroboam the son of Joash. Now the rest of the acts of Jeroboam, and all that he did, and his might, how he warred, and how he recovered Damascus, and Hamath, which belonged to Judah, for Israel, are they not written in the 29 book of the Chronicles of the kings of Israel? And Jeroboam slept with his fathers, even with the kings of Israel; and Zachariah his son reigned in his stead.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 4.—[The participle here marks an event which was going on at the same time with another. Examples of this are numerous. Cf. 1 Kings i. 8; iii. 26; v. 24; 2 Kings viii. 6.

² Ver. 6.—The keri is the result of a desire to reproduce literally the text of Deuteronomy, but it is unnecessary. Read the chetib, כִּי־נִלְחָמוּ.

³ Ver. 8.—[פָּנֵינוּ לְפָנֵי, פָּנֵינוּ is acc. of the part affected. "Let us look upon one another, as to the face" = "let us look upon one another's face," cf. 4. a, "let us measure strength with one another." Ewald (Lehrbuch, § 261, c) explains it: "Let us look upon one another as to the person," cf. 4. a, in person.

⁴ Ver. 13.—[The keri is unnecessary. Punctuate the chetib כִּי־נִלְחָמוּ.

⁵ Ver. 14.—[Literally: "Sons of pledges."

⁶ Ver. 25.—[כָּל־מִדְּבָר would be literally from as far as; cf. 4. a, it expresses that he penetrated up as far as Hamath, came near to that place, and then made it a point of departure on the north, from which he extended his conquests southward to the Dead Sea.

⁷ Ver. 26.—[כָּל־מִדְּבָר from כָּל־דָּבָר. Gesen. (Theol. a. v.) understands it to mean deep-rooted, of long standing, but the latest and best expositors agree to take כָּל־דָּבָר in the sense of כָּל־דָּבָר, to be bitter.—W. G. S.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 1. In the second year of Joash . . . Amaziah . . . became king. On the chronological datum see chap. xiii. 1. Ver. 3. Instead of the words: not like David, his father, the parallel account in Chronicles (xxv. 2) reads: "Not with all his heart." The additional statement: He did in all things as Joash his father had done, shows that Amaziah, in the first part of his reign, was devoted to the worship of Jehovah as Joash was (chap. xii. 3), but that afterwards, especially after his victory over Edom, he introduced, or at least tolerated, the worship of the false gods of Edom, as his father had permitted the worship of Asherah (2 Chron. xxiv. 2, 18). [It is putting too great a strain on these words to make them cover any such accurate parallelism between the lives of the two kings, especially when this parallelism is constructed by borrowing from the Chronicles. It is simply meant that his general policy, and the extent to which he conformed to the demands of the Jehovah-religion, were modelled upon his father's conduct.—W. G. S.] The passage 2 Chron. xxv. 14 does not, therefore, contradict this verse, as Thenius and Bertheau assert; on the contrary, ver. 2 of the Chronicle contains the same assertion as ver. 3 here. [An attentive comparison of the records of Kings and Chronicles at this point reveals some most interesting characteristics of each, and nothing could be mere mischievous than a false effort to "harmonize" and "reconcile," which should obliterate these distinguishing characteristics. A comparison of chap. xii. 2 with 2 Chron. xxiv. 2 shows a difference of judgment as to Joash's career. (See translator's note on xii. 2.) In perfect consistency, each with its own general judgment, Kings says nothing of any idolatry of Joash, while Chronicles records such an error (2 Chron. xxiv. 18). Again, Kings approves in general of Amaziah's career, although it was not up to the standard of David (chap. xiv. 3; cf. also xv. 3). Ver. 4 tells wherein he failed according to this author. 2 Chron. xxv. 2 might be considered equivalent to this, but ver. 14 states the fault which the chronicler had to find with him, while Kings is silent in regard to any such sin. The two accounts are each consistent with itself, but they differ in regard to their general estimate of the careers of these two kings. Thenius and Bertheau think that the chronicler inferred from the misfortunes of these kings that they must have been unfaithful to Jehovah, but it is unnecessary to adopt so violent an explanation of the divergence. The chronicler either had more information, or a stricter standard.—W. G. S.] On ver. 4 see note on 1 Kings iii. 2. On ver. 5 cf. chap. xii. 21 sq. As it was the custom in the Orient to put to death not only conspirators themselves, but also their children (Curtius VI. 11, 20; Roscsmüller, Altes und Neues Morgenland, II. s. 59), ver. 6 expressly emphasizes the fact that Amaziah, in obedience to Deut. xxiv. 16, did not do this, and thereby proved himself to be a faithful king according to the Israelitish standards. The words: As it is written, &c., are not, as Thenius asserts, an explanatory addition by the "redactor;" they do not merely give his opinion; they rather state the true historical reason why Amaziah acted as he did. It is clear, therefore, from this passage, that the author of these books assumes the existence of the book of Deuteronomy at that time, and did not at all suppose that it was first composed under Manasseh, 150 years later, as modern criticism (Riehm) maintains. We do not know whether Amaziah acted according to this precept on his own motive, or not. Perhaps he was exhorted to it by a prophet or a priest.

Ver. 7. He slew of Edom. The Edomites revolted from Judah, according to chap. viii. 20, during the reign of Joram. Amaziah undertook to resubjugate them, and prepared great military resources to this end, as is narrated in 2 Chron. xxv. 5 sq. The valley of salt (2 Sam. viii. 13; 1 Chron. xviii. 12) is a plain about two miles broad, south of the Dead Sea, which does not show a sign of vegetation. It is now called El-Ghor (Robinson, Palestine, II. 488 and 489). The chronicler does not mention the capture of Sela, but states that, besides the 10,000 who fell, 10,000 others were taken prisoners and thrown from a rock. Sela lay south of the valley of salt, in a valley which was shut in by rocks, but which was well watered and fruitful; it is the well-known Petra, and it was as important in a military as in a mercantile point of view. Cf. Winer, R.-W.-B. II. s. 446 sq. The new name given to this town by the victor is significant. קִרְיַת־בְּנֵי־נֶחֱמִיָּה means a Deo subactum, in servitum redactum (Gesenius, s. v.).

We see from the phrase: unto this day, that the original document, from which our author took the history of Amaziah's reign, belonged to the time of that king, or at least to a time not long after his death. As soon as the city came into other hands again, which it did under Ahaz (chap. xvi. 6), it certainly lost that humiliating name. It is possible indeed that it continued to be called by this name by the Jews, so that the argument is not conclusive, but, if we do not adopt this hypothesis, we must infer that the original document, in which stood the words "unto this day," which the redactor has preserved, was written at least before the time of Ahaz. Of course this place has nothing to do with the Jektheel mentioned in Joshua xv. 38.

Ver. 8. Then Amaziah sent messengers.

This took place after the brilliant victory over the Edomites. The detailed statement "son of Jehoahaz, son of Jehu," &c., gives ground for the supposition that the original authority for ver. 8 sq. is different from that of vers. 1-7. [Let us look one another in the face. See Grammatical on the verse. This is a literal translation. Though the formula is variously explained, yet its significance is clear. It is a challenge to combat.—W. G. S.] Josephus says that Amaziah sent a letter to king Joash, in which he demanded of him to submit himself and people, as they had once been subject to David and Solomon, adding that, if he would not do this, a pitched battle should decide between them which had the superior authority (Antiq. ix. 2). It is also possible that, as the rabbis say, the acts mentioned in 2 Chron. xxv. 13 occasioned this demand.—The parable in ver. 9 is not to be pressed too much in its details. The main point is the contrast of the largest, strongest, and most majestic tree, the cedar, and the contemptible, weak, and useless, although prickly, briar (not, as Thenius maintains, thistle. Cf. Prov. xxvi. 9; 1 Sam. xiii. 6; Job xxxi. 40. [The comparison between a tree and a briar bush is more correct and appropriate than between a tree and a thistle]). These two stand side by side upon Lebanon. No wild beast can break down and crush the cedar, but it is very possible that this may occur with the briar. It is more a proverb than a parable, like the story in Judges ix. 8-15. The words: Give thy daughter to my son to wife, are not to be interpreted as implying that Amaziah had demanded a daughter of Joash as a wife for one of his sons (Derezer); neither is the explanation that the kingdom of Israel is the daughter, and the kingdom of Judah the son (Thenius), a fit interpretation of the haughty parable of the king of Israel. Only he who is equal to the father may demand of the latter his daughter as a wife for his son, not one who stands as far below the father as the briar below the cedar. If such an one as this latter does make such a proposal, he is guilty of arrogance and presumption, and he must expect to be set in his proper place.—Thenius' translation of ver. 10: "Show thy might at home," is not correct, as we see from 2 Chron. xxv. 19, where we read: "Thine heart lifteth thee up to boast (לְהִתְבָּהֵר); abide now at home." בְּבֵיתְךָ, in the hifil, means to win honor or fame (Gesen.). The Vulg. is right according to the sense: contentus esto gloria et sede tua in domo tua.—Calamity is here spoken of as a hostile power, against which one fights in vain [or rather, in stricter accordance with the literal meaning of מִתְבָּהֵר, upon which one makes a rash and causeless attack, and so provokes it, brings it down upon one's self.]

Ver. 11. But Amaziah would not hear. Beth-Shemesh (cf. note on 1 Kings iv. 9), where the two armies met, was in Judah, on the southern border of Dan, and therefore much nearer to Jerusalem than to Samaria. It follows that Joash did not wait for the attack of Amaziah, but anticipated his movements and so carried the war into the enemy's country. Josephus says that Joash threatened the captive Amaziah with death, if he did not compel the inhabitants of Jerusalem to open the gates, and grant him free admission with his army into the city; and that Amaziah, in fear for his life, brought about the admission of the enemy. This statement, although it stands by itself, and has no support from any other authority, does not, at any rate, contradict the biblical text. Instead of the chetib וַיָּבֵאוּ, in ver. 13, the keri offers וַיָּבֵא. In 2 Chron. xxv. 23 there stands instead of either: וַיָּבֵאֵהוּ, i. e., "he brought him." The Sept. have this reading in the verse before us also (ἡγάγεον αὐτόν), and the Vulg. follows: adduxit eum. Thenius, therefore, adopts this as the original reading, but unnecessarily, for if Joash took Amaziah prisoner and did not put him to death, it is a matter of course that he took him with him when he went farther. The chronicler simply expresses himself a little more definitely. Although Jehoash did not need to besiege Jerusalem, yet he caused a large piece of its wall of fortification to be torn down, from the gate of Ephraim to the corner gate. The former stood on the north side of the city, towards Ephraim, and was also called the gate of Benjamin, because the road to Ephraim ran through the territory of Benjamin. It is now called the gate of Damascus. The latter was to the west of this, at the point where the wall turned southward: i. e., at the northwest corner of the city. According to Thenius וְךָ does not here denote the terminus ad

quem, but only the direction in which, because the distance between them was more than 400 cubits, viz., 2,000 English feet. The question arises, however, whether Thenius has correctly fixed the situation of the corner-gate on his plan of the city, and whether the distance was as great as he supposes, as the city was laid out before the exile. In descriptions of localities, וְךָ always serves to define the limit up to which, and not merely the direction. Josephus' assertion that Jehoash caused a breach (διακρή) 30 cubits wide to be made in the wall, and that he drove through this in a chariot with the captive king by his side, has no foundation in the biblical text. Jehoash's purpose in ordering the wall to be torn down was not to get a grand gateway for a triumphal entry (Thenius), but to mark the city as captured, and as lying open on the side of Ephraim.—The "hostages" (ver. 14) were demanded by Jehoash especially because he, as Josephus expressly states, gave the king his freedom, but desired still to hold him in check. They were taken, no doubt, from the most important families, but they were hardly sons of the king himself, for, if they had been, it would probably have been so stated. The treasures, which the victor carried off, were not probably very great (see chap. xiii. 18), and the word הַמִּצְנֵי seems to hint at this.

Ver. 15. Now the rest of the acts, &c. The repetition of the standing formula, in regard to Jehoash, after it had once been used in chap. xiii. 12, 13, has its explanation probably in this, that the author found it in the document from which he took vers. 8-17, as well as in that from which he took chap. xiii. An especial reason for adopting this explanation is that the formula is not precisely the same here as in the former place. "The name of the king of Israel is there written three times יְהוֹשָׁפָט", whereas we have here twice יְהוֹשָׁפָט. The latter form is preserved throughout the section vers. 8-17, whereas in ver. 1 the shorter form occurs. Here, the natural succession of the details is observed (death, burial, successor); there, there is a transposition (death, successor, burial)" (Thenius). Nevertheless, the author may have been led to repeat the formula because ver. 17 "contains an important statement which is connected with Joash's death," namely, that Amaziah lived and reigned for fifteen years after Joash died. The author felt obliged to repeat the notice of Joash's death, as an introduction to this statement (Superflua non nocent).

Ver. 17. And Amaziah, &c. This chronological datum stands in perfect accord with the ones before given in vers. 1 and 2 and in chap. xiii. 10. Amaziah reigned in all 29 years; 15 after Joash's death; therefore, 14 with him. As Joash reigned 16 years, Amaziah's succession falls in his second year, as is stated in ver. 1. [See the translator's note on ver. 22.]—If we bear in mind that Amaziah's war with Edom took place before that with Joash, we are led to infer that the latter took place shortly before Joash's death. The old expositors adopted the supposition that Amaziah spent the 15 years after Joash's death in retirement and contempt, as a deposed king, and that the conspiracy was a consequence of his disgraceful defeat (ver. 19). There is no ground for such an hypothesis, however, for if the conspiracy had been formed after that defeat, it would not have been 15 years before it was consummated. The chronicler says (chap. xxv. 27): "Now, after the time that Amaziah did turn away from following the Lord (i. e., from the time when he, after the victory over the Edomites, brought their gods back to Jerusalem with him, 2 Chron. xxv. 14), they made a conspiracy against him in Jerusalem." This time was before the war with Joash and the great defeat; it is only intended to assert that the unfortunate end of Amaziah was a punishment for his apostasy. The conspiracy must have had some other especial cause which is not stated. According to Thenius, who explains all the people of Judah (ver. 21) to mean the whole military force, it was a conspiracy of the army. It may be, however, that a general dissatisfaction arose among the people from other causes, and that this finally led to the conspiracy.—Lachish was originally a royal city of the Canaanites in the lowlands of southern Palestine. Joshua conquered it, and afterwards gave it to the tribe of Judah (Jos. x. 31; xv. 39). Rehoboam fortified it against the Philistines (2 Chron. xi. 9). Amaziah fled to this place, probably because he could easily flee across the frontier from there if the necessity should arise. The conspirators seem to have followed upon his heels. According to ver. 20 it is probable that they brought the slain king back to Jerusalem in his own royal chariot.

Ver. 21. And all the people of Judah took, &c. It is remarkable that, in this case also, the conspirators did not take one of their own number and make him king, but, as in chap. xii. 22, they adhered to the succession of the house of David. It is doubtful whether Azariah was the oldest son of Amaziah, for it is most probable that the latter, at the age of 54, when he died, left sons older than this boy of 16 years. The expression יָקָוּ appears to imply that they chose this boy on account of some peculiar characteristics.—The new king is called here and in chap. xv. 1, 6, 7, 8, 17, 23, 27, יְרָמְיָהוּ; on the contrary, in chap. xv. 13, 31, 32, 34, as in the Chronicle (except 1 Chron. ii. 12), [and in Isai. i. 1; vi. 1; Hos. i. 1; Amos i. 1; Zach. xiv. 5], he is called יְרָמְיָהוּ. Against the explanation that יְרָמְיָהוּ is an error of the copyist, arising from the similarity of the י and the י, is the consideration that the error, if it be an error, is repeated so often. "We must rather suppose that the king really had both these names, which are very closely connected" (Keil). [In the ed. of 1865, he says that they are used "promiscuously."] Vatablus: duo nomina habuit affinia: Fortitudo Domini, et Auxilium Domini. [The two names are at least very nearly equivalent in etymological meaning: יְרָמְיָהוּ (he whose) Help (is) Jehovah; יָקָוּ (he whose) Strength (is) Jehovah. Bertheau calls attention to a similar case. In 1 Chron. xxv. 4, among the sons of Heman, is one who is called Uzziel. A comparison of the names in the subsequent repetition shows that he is the person called Azareel in ver. 18.—W. G. S.] This is quite possible in view of the frequency with which names are changed in the Orient. The name Uziah seems to have been generally used after his accession to the throne (see the places where it occurs in the later prophets, which are quoted above).—Ver. 22. On Elath, see note on 1 Kings ix. 26. Either Amaziah did not push forward as far as this important port of commerce, in his expedition against the Edomites, or else he was unable to retain possession of it after his defeat by Joash, at Beth Shemesh; but Edom was not a valuable possession for Judah except as it involved the possession of Elath. That the new king took this city and "built" it, that is, either extended it or strengthened it, was a most important event for the kingdom, and especially for his own authority. That is why it is here mentioned by anticipation at the beginning of his reign, whereas his further history is not given until later, in chap. xv. 1-7. We cannot infer from the clause: after that the king slept with his fathers, that Azariah undertook this expedition "at once" (Thenius), and advanced victoriously to Elath, for he was, at the time of his accession, a boy of 16 years. However, it may well have been in the early part of his reign. [This clause is very enigmatical. No satisfactory explanation of it has ever been offered. It is said that a certain king died, another succeeded, and when the author goes on to mention the acts of the latter's reign, he says that he did a certain thing after the (former) king was dead. It is either a most idle and meaningless statement, or else it has a significance which has not yet been perceived. It is difficult to avoid the suspicion that it alludes to the fact that Azariah was made king after his father was captured by Jehoash, and before he was released, and that he did this after his father's release and death. This would account for Azariah's youth at the time he was made king. Ver. 22 would then follow ver. 14 in the connection of the narrative. In view of the form and substance of the intervening verses this is not at all impossible. After ver. 14 the author goes on to tell (a) what became of Jehoash, (b) what became of Amaziah, (c) what the people of Judah did after their king was captured (ver. 22). The immediate release of Amaziah by Jehoash rests only upon the authority of Josephus. In connection with this the other remarkable datum in ver. 17 may be noticed: Amaziah lived 15 years after Joash. (It is worth noticing that it does not say that he reigned.) Ewald understands this to mean that he lived as a captive, and was finally released by Jeroboam; but he does not suppose that Azariah was made king until after his father's assassination. This would leave Judah kingless for 15 years, and force us to assume that its king was assassinated as soon as he was released. If, however, we suppose that, after Amaziah was taken away captive, his son was made king; that when Amaziah was released and returned to Judah, he was not welcome there; and that the conspiracy was formed to remove him, we have a consistent theory throughout. With regard, then, to the chronology: Chap. xv. 1 says that Azariah became king in the 27th of Jerob. II. This is inconsistent with every other chronological datum, and is universally sacrificed (see the Comm. on the verse). Zachariah's accession in the 38th of Azariah would fix Azariah's accession in the 3d or 4th of Jeroboam, if we hold fast 41 years as the duration of Jeroboam's reign. If, as seems very probable, Joash died soon after he defeated and captured Amaziah, then the people of Judah waited 3 or 4 years for the release of their king, and when this did not take place, they made Azariah king. Amaziah lived 11 years longer, was released, returned, and was assassinated, and Azariah was 27 years old when he took Elath. This construction is consistent with all the texts. The "29 years" in xiv. 2, cover the period from Amaziah's accession to his death, and the "15 years" in ver. 17 hold good. Azariah reigned for 52 years from the date of his coronation, or 41 years from the date of his father's death. In the text his coronation is recognized as the true beginning of his reign, and the dates for the accession of Zachariah, Shallum, Menahem, Pekahiah, Pekah, and Jotham, are all consistent therewith. Against this construction is the strong consideration that the circumstances are not more distinctly narrated. We have no mention of Amaziah's release at all. There are also difficulties connected with the chronology, but these confront us in any case. They can only be removed by arbitrary changes, and these changes can only be based upon conjecture. Every time that I have re-examined the chronology of this period the suspicion has been revived in my mind that the error, which undoubtedly inheres in it at this point, is to be sought in the duration ascribed to the reign of Amaziah, although the chronologies almost all alter the data in regard to Jeroboam or Azariah. It may be that the clue to the solution of the difficulty lies in the captivity of Amaziah.—W. G. S.]

Ver. 23. In the fifteenth year of Amaziah, &c. This statement agrees with that in ver. 1 and in ver. 17. Amaziah ruled 29 years; 14 with Joash of Israel, and 15 with his son Jeroboam II. The further statement, however, that Jeroboam reigned for 41 years, is contradicted by chap. xv. 8, which says that the son and successor of Jeroboam, Zachariah, came to the throne in the 38th year of Azariah (Uzziah). Now if Jeroboam reigned with Amaziah for 15 years, and then 38 years more with Azariah, his entire reign was not 41 but 53 years, or if, as is probable, the 15 years and the 38 years were not all complete (see Pt. II., p. 86), then 51 years. As all the chronologers agree that Zachariah's accession cannot be placed earlier than the 38th of Azariah, it is generally assumed, in order to account for the difference between 41 and 51 years, that an interregnum or anarchy of 10 years took place after the death of Jeroboam (Keil and others). But, according to chap. xiv. 29, Zachariah followed his father Jeroboam, not after an interval of 10 or 11 years, but immediately after his death. Moreover there is not the slightest sign, in the history, of any period of anarchy, though such a period must certainly have been marked by some important incidents, and we may not make history in order to account for a single inconsistent chronological statement. According to Hos. i. 1, that prophet labored under Jeroboam II., and also under Hezekiah, who did not come to the throne until 727 B. C. Now, if Jeroboam only reigned 41 years, from 823 to 782, Hosea must have labored as a prophet publicly before 782 and after 727, that is, for over 60 years; but this hardly seems possible. But if Jeroboam reigned 51 years, 823-772, then still Hosea's public work covers the great but not impossible time of 50 years. For all these reasons we are compelled to conclude, with Thienius, that there is an error here in copying the letters which designate the numbers (N^{D} —41 for N^{J} —51), and that the latter would be the correct number. Wolff (see Pt. II., p. 89), with whose other combinations we do not agree, considers the number 41 incorrect, and reckons the years of the reign of Jeroboam II. at 52. [See bracketed note on ver. 22.]

Ver. 25. He restored the coast of Israel, &c. As in 1 Kings viii. 65; Amos vi. 2, 14, Hamath, by which we must understand not a city merely, but also a district of Syria (2 Kings xxiii. 33; xxv. 21), is here used to designate the northern boundary of Palestine. The sea of the plain is the Dead Sea (Deut. iii. 17; Jos. iii. 16), the ordinary designation of the southern boundary of Palestine, east of the Jordan, which is more definitely marked on the frontier of Moab by the brook Arnon which flows into the Dead Sea (Isai. xvi. 2). [Cf. also Amos vi. 14.] Jonah is the well-known prophet (Jon. i. 1) from the city of Gath-Hepher, which lay in the territory of Zebulun (Jos. xix. 13). This oracle does not lose any of its historical value from the fact that it is not to be found in the "Book of Jonah" which we possess. It is incomprehensible how Menzel could suppose that the book of Jonah "contains this prophecy in a metaphorical form, although not directly." Others, as Hitzig and Knobel, think that Isaiah xv. and xvi. contains the oracle of Jonah here referred to, an hypothesis which rests upon a very weak basis.—In vers. 26 and 27 it is explained how it came about that the frontiers were restored by a king who still maintained the worship of Jeroboam's calves. The ground for this lay in Jehovah's pity for His chosen people. He had not yet declared that He would blot it out for its apostasy. He helped it out of the deep distress into which it had been brought by the Syrians (chap. xiii. 3, 7), and prospered it to an extent which was no longer to be expected or hoped for; for, though Jehoash had recovered all the lost cities on this side of the Jordan, yet all the territory beyond the river was still in the hands of the Syrians. Jeroboam was the one who recovered it. On וָיָשׁוּב and וָיָשׁוּב see note on 1 Kings xiv. 10; cf. Deut. xxxii. 36.—In ver. 28, וָיָשׁוּב cannot be translated otherwise than as in ver. 25: he brought back. Ewald desires to strike out, וָיָשׁוּב and then to read וָיָשׁוּב instead of וָיָשׁוּב: "He recovered Damascus and Hamath for Israel." These changes are as violent as they are unnecessary. וָיָשׁוּב is a periphrasis for the genitive, because the proper names do not admit of any form for the stat. const. (Keil, Thenius), and וָיָשׁוּב before וָיָשׁוּב means to or for. As, however, neither the cities nor the districts of Hamath and Damascus ever belonged to Judah or Israel, it is impossible to say, in the strict sense of the words, that he brought them back. David had, indeed, once conquered a part of Syria (Damascus, 2 Sam. viii. 5 and 6), and Solomon had conquered a part of Hamath (2 Chron. viii. 3, 4). It was these districts, which had long before made themselves independent of any authority of Israel, which Jeroboam recovered. The sense is then: Jeroboam re-established the frontiers of the kingdom as they had once been under David and Solomon, i. e., at the most flourishing period of the kingdom.

HISTORICAL AND ETHICAL.

1. The reign of Amaziah had, in general, the same course as that of his father Joash (chap. 12). "We see the same good beginning, the same bad progress, and the same sad and terrible ending in the case of Amaziah as in that of Joash" (Schlier). The text itself affirms this by the words: "He did in all things like as Joash his father had done" (ver. 3.). The reasons why he clung, at the commencement of his reign, to the lawful worship of Jehovah, were rather external and traditional than the result of an internal conviction. He may have seen that this was necessary for the maintenance of his authority, just as the kings of Israel considered it necessary for political reasons to maintain the worship of Jeroboam's calf-images. It certainly was not an affair of the heart with him (2 Chron. xxv. 2). "He was a soldier with all his heart, and he was nothing more" (Calv. Bibel). He wanted military glory, and therefore, immediately after his accession to the throne, he collected a large army, and also hired mercenaries from Israel (2 Chron.

xv. 5 and 6). The Edomites had not provoked in any way the attack upon themselves; it was purely an expedition for conquest. The brilliant victory which he won made him arrogant, and intensified his thirst for war, so that he, in haughty self-confidence and without external occasion, challenged Israel to war, and insisted even when the latter put aside the challenge and warned him to give up his plan. His arrogance was severely punished; he was subjected to a humiliation such as no king of Judah had experienced, not even his father Joash. The Chronicler represents this as a divine judgment upon him because he introduced the worship of the gods of Edom into Judah upon his return from the expedition, and repelled haughtily the warning of a prophet against this course (2 Chron. xxv. 14–16). There is no occasion at all to doubt this story, as Thenius does, because it "is intended to put in pragmatic form the theocratic explanation of the unfortunate result of the war with Israel." Neither is it contradictory to ver. 3. The idea that divine judgments follow upon idolatry and the worship of false gods is one which runs through the entire Old Testament economy; it is not peculiar to the Chronicler, but was held also by the author of the Books of Kings, and, indeed, by all the Old Testament writers. Amaziah's unfortunate and shameful end showed that it was not enough for a king of Judah to observe the law for mere external and political reasons, but that he fulfilled his calling only when he, like David, clung to Jehovah "with all his heart."

2. It has been regarded as a proof of extraordinary humanity on the part of Amaziah that, although he put to death, upon his accession, the murderers of his father, nevertheless he spared their sons and relatives, contrary to the course which was commonly pursued in such cases (Curtius 6, 11: Leges caute erant, ut propinquos eorum, qui regi insidiati cum ipso necarentur. Cf. Cic. ad Brut. 15). "We see," says Eisenlohr (Das Volk Israel, II. s. 203), "that there was a remarkable development and growth of moral feeling in the nation, and that a humane and generous culture gradually supplanted the former harshness. We are forced to recognize this movement in spite of exceptional instances to the contrary, and we see that it went hand in hand with the decay of the more rigid and formal conception of moral relations, and with the growth of a more expanded moral vision." But there are no signs of any progress in humanity at this period. On the contrary, we are rather forced to infer from the oracles of the prophets Amos and Hosea, that it was a time of rudeness and violence. As for Amaziah, it is impossible to speak of any humane disposition in a man who, after killing 10,000 Edomites in battle, proceeded to throw from a rock 10,000 more who had been captured alive (2 Chron. xxv. 11, 12). The author only means to say that Amaziah, in the beginning of his reign, was guided by the precepts of the Law, and that he obeyed them also in regard to the punishment of those concerned in the murder of his father, and their children. This law came from Moses, and was not the product of a later and (as is asserted) more humane time. This is not disproved by the fact that the precept in question is contained in the Book of Deuteronomy, for that book did not repeal or abolish former statutes, it only renewed and extended them. Hitzig is decidedly in error when he says, on Jerem. xxxi. 29 (cf. Ezek. xviii. 2 sq.): "The punishment of the sins of the fathers upon the children, a legal institution of the old covenant, is, according to ver. 29, repealed. This repeal is accomplished (ver. 31) by abolishing the entire former covenant." In the places cited, the prophets Jeremiah and Ezekiel are attacking the popular error that God had left the guilty parents unpunished, and was now punishing the children for their sins (cf. Havernick on Ezekiel xviii.). The author of this passage in Kings is not speaking of God's punishment of men, but of the punishment of the sons of the murderers by the king, i. e., by the civil power. The civil punishment of the sons of wrong-doers for the crimes of their fathers was abolished, not in the time of Ezekiel or Jeremiah, but by the law of Moses. Amaziah's conduct was not dictated by thirst for vengeance against the fathers, nor by humane pity for the sons. It was rather a simple act of justice, in which he behaved, both towards the fathers (Ex. xxi. 12; Levit. xxiv. 17), and towards the sons (Deut. xxiv. 16), according to the Law.

[The question of the degree of humanity to be ascribed to Amaziah is of little importance. It is certain that his conduct was very different from that which was observed on all the changes of dynasties in Israel, and by Athaliah in Judah. These events were marked by the wholesale bloodshed which was common in similar cases elsewhere in the Orient. The author of the book of Kings ascribes this action of the king to his loyalty to the law of Moses, i. e., Deuteronomy. The bearing of the text on the question of the time of composition of the book of Deuteronomy is plain. If the author is correct in his explanation of Amaziah's conduct, then the Book of Deuteronomy was in existence at this time. This is not the place to discuss the general evidence for the time of composition of that book, but the evidence of this verse can only be avoided by supposing that the author carried back to Amaziah the ideas of a book which was written 150 years after his death, but before the time when the Book of Kings was written, or else that this verse was put in by the compiler. Those who maintain the late origin of Deuteronomy are divided between these explanations.—The idea that God punishes the sins of the fathers upon the children is certainly found in the Mosaic Law (Exod. xx. 5; Deut. v. 9), and it is a simple fact of observation and experience, both in history and in private life. This is at once a proof and a consequence of the solidarity of the human race. No man can commit an action which will not have greater or less effect upon his contemporaries and upon succeeding generations. Those on whom the punishment falls complain of injustice in this order of things, as the Jews did who had to bear the captivity, while their fathers, who had incurred the penalty, had lived in luxury and sin and died in peace, at home. Against them the prophets maintained the justice of God in his dealings with individuals, and the responsibility of each for his own sins only. This was, undeniably, a modification or explanation of Deut. v. 9. Jeremiah (xxxi. 29 sq.) represents it as a new covenant which is to take the place of the old. Deut. xxiv. 16 is entirely different. It forbids, plainly and most justly, that men shall imitate the course of nature, which entails upon the children the consequences of the father's sins, by inflicting upon children physical punishment for their fathers' crimes. The latter alone comes into the discussion of Amaziah's conduct.—W. G. S.]

3. The representation of king Joash which is here given us supplements essentially the portrait of him which we had in the last chapter. The manner in which he here repels Amaziah's challenge is not by any means a well-meant warning; it is rather calculated to exasperate him, and to stimulate his thirst for war still further. It bears witness, not to faith and trust in God, but to great self-confidence and arrogance. The old spirit of Ephraim appears here again, and, pluming itself upon superior numbers, and external greatness and power, looks down contemptuously upon Judah. The parable of the cedar of Lebanon and the briar-bush at its feet is a piece of genuine oriental bombast, for which Joash had the less ground inasmuch as all that part of Israel beyond Jordan was still in the hands of the Syrians, and Israel was altogether in a distressed condition from which Jeroboam II. was the first to relieve it (ver. 26). Moreover, Joash did not bear in mind that fire can go forth, even out of a briar, and consume the cedars of Lebanon (Judges ix. 15). For the rest, Joash sustained himself here as a valiant soldier; he did not wait for Amaziah to attack him, but took the initiative himself, pushed on to the neighborhood of Amaziah's capital, inflicted upon him a signal defeat, and took him captive. We are not told why he did not put him to death, and, after taking Jerusalem, put an end to the kingdom of Judah, as Nebuchadnezzar afterwards did (chap. xxv.). It can hardly have been from magnanimity that he took the captive king with him to Jerusalem, left him upon the throne, and contented himself with hostages. It is more natural to suppose that he did this from arrogance. The "cedar" treated the "briar" with contempt, and let him go as beneath fear. Nevertheless he took hostages as security. We have to recognize here a dispensation of Him who meant indeed to humble Amaziah (2 Chron. xxv. 20), but who would not permit that Israel should become master of Judah.

4. Jeroboam II. reigned, even if we take the number 41 to be correct, longer than any other king of Israel. The history of his reign is given here very concisely, and, with the exception of the incidental mention, Amos vii. 10, we have no further information. Besides the fact that he, like all his predecessors, maintained the worship of the calf-images, we are only told in regard to him that God, according to the prophecy of Jonah, through him rescued Israel from its bitter distress, and that he restored the frontiers of the country as they had existed under David and Solomon. The complete defeat of the Syrians, and the expulsion of these arch-enemies, who had brought the kingdom to the verge of ruin, had the most important consequences. These events took place early in the reign of Jeroboam, and they show us Jeroboam as the most able and energetic of the kings of Israel. The latter part of his reign seems to have passed away without any decisive events. It was a time of peace and quiet, in which, as chap. xiii. 5 says, "The children of Israel dwelt in their tents as before," and the people enjoyed the fruit of the victory over the Syrians. It follows that Jeroboam was not only a valiant soldier, but also a prudent ruler, who understood how to use the time of peace so as to raise the material condition of his people. From the prophecies of the contemporary prophets

Amos and Hosea, it is evident that the kingdom had then attained a state of prosperity such as it had never before enjoyed (cf. Amos vi. 4-6; iii. 15; Hos. xii. 8). The deep depravity of the people, however, appeared just at this time, for, instead of being led, by God's bountiful goodness, to repentance, they were stimulated to pride, so that Hosea said: "According to their pasture, so were they filled," &c. (Hos. xiii. 6). Not only did the worship of the calf-images continue, but also the worship of false gods increased (Hos. iv. 12, 17; viii. 4; xi. 2; xiii. 2). A shocking corruption of morals found entrance at the same time: luxury, debauchery, shameless licentiousness, injustice, violence, falsehood, and deceit of all kinds (Amos ii. 6 sq.; iii. 9; v. 12; vi. 4-7; Hos. iv. 1, 2, 18), so that the kingdom went on from the height of its prosperity, only the more surely, towards its final downfall. (See the next chapter.) In so far, the time of Jeroboam was a turning point in the history of Israel. It gave the proof that this nation could better endure misfortune and oppression of every kind than earthly glory and prosperity; therefore the Lord allowed it, for its own salvation, to fall from its position as an independent nation (chap. xvii. 6 sq.).

5. The prophet Jonah, who foretold the victory of Jeroboam over the Syrians, and the restoration of the ancient boundaries by him, must have appeared in the early part of his reign. He is the first of the line of prophets who not only spoke (preached), but also wrote down their prophecies. A new phase of prophecy begins with him, so that in this respect also the reign of Jeroboam was most important for the history of redemption. Up to this point the activity of the class of prophets of whom Elijah and Elisha were the chief, was especially [and almost exclusively] directed to the present, and aimed to bring about a return from the worship of the calves, and from idolatry, to the fundamental law of Israel. They seized upon events and circumstances, not so much by their teaching and preaching, as by their acts, and their acts were signs, that is, they were acts which transmitted a divine revelation. "Since now," as Hasse (Geschichte des Alten Bundes, s. 110 sq.) remarks, "the house of Jehu, which owed everything to the prophets, also failed to return to the original purity of the Israelitish constitution, and since it persevered in its idolatry even under Jeroboam II., who no longer had any foreign enemy to fear, every hope of a reformation in the northern kingdom had to be given up, and the prophets could no longer hope to accomplish anything there by actual interference [i. e., by such acts as the deposing of one dynasty and the institution of another. Even that extreme measure had failed in the case of the house of Jehu]; they could only allow the evil to go on to its consummation. They, therefore, gradually withdrew from the direction of affairs, and regarded it as their only remaining task to make known to this stubborn and hard-hearted generation the judgment which it was bringing down upon itself. Just at the time, therefore, when the northern kingdom was at the very height of its glory, Amos and Hosea proclaimed to it its approaching ruin, and, because Judah had also been tainted by the contagion of apostasy, Joel also appeared there at the same time, as herald of the coming judgment. This judgment could not, of course, arrest the higher destiny of Israel. Therefore the prophets saw beyond it a new and purified Israel arise, and form a united kingdom under a sceptre of the house of David, which should embrace the heathen also. The Messianic kingdom, therefore, rose up more and more distinctly as the end and aim of the entire development, as the true kingdom of God, and promises of this kingdom were joined with threats of judgment. Now for the first time did prophecy become truly prophecy—that is, a vision of coming salvation which stretched forward into and anticipated the future; and where the prophets had hitherto made use of word of mouth only, in order to influence the present, and their immediate surroundings, they now made use of writing, because coming generations also were to learn what they had received into their souls." Instead of recognizing a turning-point in the history of the prophetic institution at the time of Jeroboam, Ewald asserts (Gesch. iii. s. 565 sq. 3d ed. 507 sq.) that there was a "complete dissolution of the ancient prophetic institution" at that time. "The entire school (of Elijah and Elisha) degenerated, and moved, not forwards, but backwards." The cause of this was that "the violent and imperious character which clung to all the old kind of prophecy, but especially to its developments in the northern kingdom, could no longer be maintained over against the crown. The bow was stretched too hard—it had to break. . . . A new form of the prophetic institution now arose. . . . This did not aim to be an independent power in the kingdom, to exercise a control which admitted of no contradiction, to set up and to depose kings," &c., &c. This theory rests upon the erroneous premise mentioned above (Hist. § 7, on Chap. ix.), that the ancient prophetic institution stood opposed to the crown as one independent power to another, and that they strove for the mastery, whereas the former was only a divinely appointed corrective for the latter. If we were to charge any of the prophets with violent and imperious behavior, this charge would fall first of all upon the new order of them, Hosea and Amos for instance, in comparison with whose words those of Elijah and Elisha sound mild and gentle. Jeremiah, who came still later, was called to the prophetic office with the words: "See, I have this day set thee over the nations and over the kingdoms, to root out and to pull down," &c. (Jerem. i. 10; cf. xviii. 7). The development of the prophetic institution stands in exact relation to the history of Israel, and is conditioned upon it. It does not break off with Elisha, who died under Jeroboam's predecessor. The word-prophets stand upon the shoulders of the deed-prophets, and carry on the work which they had founded and begun.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL

Vers. 1-20. The Reign of Amaziah. (a) The good beginning, vers. 1-7; (b) the deterioration as it advanced, vers. 8-14; (c) the sad ending, vers. 17-20.—Ver. 3. In cases like that of Amaziah, where faith is not completely and sincerely an affair of the heart (2 Chron. xxv. 2), it has no firm foundation and is quickly overwhelmed, either by unbelief or by superstition. A half-and-half disposition in what is good is a bridge which leads to what is evil.—In sacred and spiritual affairs we have not to ask, how did our fathers do? but, how would God have us do? Because Amaziah only did as his father had done, he finally fared as his father had fared.—Vers. 5 and 6. The civil authority does not carry the sword in vain, but it is an avenger to inflict punishment upon him who does wickedly (Rom. xiii. 4). It is as much a sin to leave the guilty unpunished as to punish the innocent. Right and justice are distorted by both courses. Where regicides are allowed to go unpunished, out of pity or weakness, there all justice ceases. The throne [and the civil authority] are not established by weak concessions, but by righteousness (Prov. xvi. 12).—Although the faults of the fathers are not nowadays visited upon the children, yet it is not rare that the son suffers from enmity which his father incurred.

Vers. 7-14. Pride goes before a Fall. (a) Amaziah's arrogance; (b) his fall.—Ver. 7. Victory cometh from the Lord (Prov. xxi. 31). If Amaziah had seen and believed this, he would have given to God the honor, and would have humbled himself; but he ascribed the victory to himself and to his own power, and so became haughty and arrogant (Jerem. xvii. 5, 7).—Extraordinary success in our undertakings is a great temptation to arrogance (WÜRT. SUMM.: Those must be strong legs which can support great good fortune and prosperity). God blesses our undertakings in order that we may become, not haughty, but humble (Gen. xxxii. 10 and 11). Every undue self-exaltation robs us of the blessing again. Paul labored with greater success than any other of the apostles, but he was so far from proudly exalting his heart on this account that he called himself the least of the apostles, and said: "By the grace of God I am what I am" (1 Cor. xv. 9, 10).—Ver. 8. To commence a war from mere lust for war and victory is an abomination in the sight of God. Quarrelsomeness among common people is the same as love of war among kings. The word of God says: "Follow peace with all men" (Heb. xii. 14), and: "If it be possible, as much as lieth in you, live peaceably with all men" (Rom. xii. 18).—Vers. 9 and 10. As you shout, so will the echo be. He who over-estimates his own strength, and pushes himself forward into the charge of things which he is not capable of managing, must not be surprised if he is contemptuously corrected. The warning to "Enjoy your victory (which you have already won) and stay at home!" belongs justly to vanity and self-exaltation.—He who desires to correct another for his arrogance must take good care not to fall into the same fault himself. Blame and complaint for the pride and arrogance of others often come from hearts which exalt themselves too much.—Do not parade your wisdom and strength, if you really possess them. The Lord breaks down even the cedars of Lebanon (Ps. xxix. 5; cf. Isai. ii. 12, 13). Little David, when he comes in the might of the Lord, is a match for the giant Goliath.—Ver. 11. When the humiliating truth is spoken out with scorn and derision, although it is in itself beneficial, yet it only exasperates and embitters, instead of leading to self-knowledge. As a bee sucks honey even out of a poisonous flower, so also a sincere and truth-loving soul will win even from the scorn and mockery of its enemies something good and beneficial for itself.—Arrogance and love of honor make men deaf to every warning and incapable of considering what is really best for them. But he who will not hear must feel.—Vers. 11-14. The defeat and fall of Amaziah proclaim loudly: (a) "Pride goeth before destruction, and a haughty spirit before a fall" (Prov. xvi. 18). "The stone falls back upon the head of him who casts it into the air" (Sir. xxvii. 28). (b) He who desires too much, loses even that which he already has; therefore, "Godliness with contentment is great gain" (1 Tim. vi. 6).—Vers. 13-16. "What is a man profited," &c. (Matt. xvi. 26). Joash won a great battle, took the king prisoner, conquered Jerusalem, and came back to Samaria crowned with glory and laden with gold and silver; but the best thing, the God who was yet worshipped and honored in Judah, he did not bring. He remained in the sins of Jeroboam until his end.—Vers. 17-20. It is the great grace of God when a long time is given to a man who has sinned grievously in order that he may make good again the harm which his sins have done, but then the responsibility is all the heavier when the limited time expires. There stands written on the tombstone of Amaziah by the finger of God this great and eternal truth: "God will resist the proud!"

Vers. 23-29. See Histor. and Eth.—Vers. 25-27. Israel's deep misery (Jer. ii. 19), and God's great pity (Ps. ciii. 10; Hos. xi. 8).—WÜRT. SUMM.: Our faithful God helps us out of trouble according to His great compassion, even when we have not deserved it of Him, but often not until our distress has reached the highest pitch and no help is to be expected from any other quarter.—When God not only helps us out of trouble which we have not deserved, but also gives us besides what we never could have hoped for or expected, He thereby says to us: "I have no pleasure in the death of the wicked," &c. (Ezek. xxxiii. 11; Rom. ii. 4).—Ver. 25. In times of need and calamity God provides faithful servants who bear witness to his pity and call men's attention to the one thing needful. Well is it for those who listen to these voices and do not harden their hearts.—Vers. 28 and 29. Jeroboam had striven for the external prosperity of his people, and, when he died, he left the kingdom in a more flourishing condition than any previous king of Israel. For its spiritual welfare, however, he had done nothing. Calf-worship and the service of false gods had continued, and a moral rottenness had found entrance, which brought the kingdom near to ruin. So has many a one, at his death, left to his children treasures which he had won by long labor and care, but those children have not been bred in the fear and love of God, and have not been taught that "The world passeth away and the lust thereof; but he that doeth the will of God abideth forever" (1 John ii. 17; 1 Peter i. 24 sq.).

THIRD SECTION.

THE MONARCHY UNDER AZARIAH (UZZIAH) AND JOTHAM IN JUDAH, AND UNDER ZACHARIAH AND OTHERS UNTIL HOSEHA, IN ISRAEL.

(2 Kings xv.-xvii.)

A.—The reigns of Azariah and Jotham in Judah, and of Zachariah, Shallum, Menahem, Pekahiah, and Pekah in Israel.

Chap. xv. 1-38. (2 Chron. xxvi. and xxvii.).

- 1 In the twenty and seventh year of Jeroboam king of Israel [,] began [omit
- 2 began] Azariah son of Amaziah king of Judah to reign [became king]. Six-
- teen years old was he when he began to reign [became king], and he reigned
- two and fifty years in Jerusalem. And his mother's name was Jecholiah of
- 3 Jerusalem. And he did that which was right in the sight of the Lord, accord-
- 4 ing [like] to all that his father Amaziah had done; save that the high places
- were not removed; the people sacrificed and burnt incense still on the high
- 5 places. And the Lord smote [touched] the king, so that he was a leper unto
- the day of his death, and dwelt in a several house [house of sickness]. And
- 6 Jotham the king's son was over the house, judging the people of the land. And
- the rest of the acts of Azariah, and all that he did, are they not written in the
- 7 book of the Chronicles of the kings of Judah? So Azariah slept with his
- fathers; and they buried him with his fathers in the city of David: and Jotham
- his son reigned in his stead.
- 8 In the thirty and eighth year of Azariah king of Judah did Zachariah the son
- 9 of Jeroboam reign over Israel in Samaria six months. And he did that which
- was* evil in the sight of the Lord, as his fathers had done: he departed not from
- 10 the sins of Jeroboam the son of Nebat, who made Israel to sin. And Shallum
- the son of Jabesh conspired against him, and smote him before the people^s, and
- 11 slew him, and reigned in his stead. And the rest of the acts of Zachariah,
- behold, they are written in the book of the Chronicles of the kings of Israel.
- 12 This was the word of the Lord which he spake unto Jehu, saying, Thy sons
- shall sit on the throne of Israel unto the fourth generation. And so it came to
- pass.
- 13 Shallum the son of Jabesh began to reign [became king] in the nine and thirtieth
- 14 year of Uzziah king of Judah; and he reigned a full month in Samaria. For
- [And] Menahem the son of Gadi went up from Tirzah, and came to Samaria, and
- smote Shallum the son of Jabesh in Samaria, and slew him, and reigned in his
- 15 stead. And the rest of the acts of Shallum, and his conspiracy which he made,
- behold, they are written in the book of the Chronicles of the kings of Israel.
- 16 Then Menahem [starting from Tirzah] smote^s Tiphshah, and all that were there-
- in, and the coasts [environs] thereof from Tirzah [omit from Tirzah]: because
- they opened not to him^s, therefore he smote it; and all the women^s therein that
- were with child he ripped up.
- 17 In the nine and thirtieth year of Azariah king of Judah began [omit began]
- Menahem the son of Gadi to reign [became king] over Israel, and reigned ten
- 18 years in Samaria. And he did that which was evil in the sight of the Lord:
- he departed not all his days [omit all his days] from the sins of Jeroboam the son
- 19 of Nebat, who made Israel to sin. And [In his days—omit And] Pul the king
- of Assyria came against the land: and Menahem gave Pul a thousand talents of
- silver, that his hand might be with him to confirm the kingdom in his hand.

- 20 And Menahem exacted [imposed] the money of [upon] Israel, even of [upon—omit even of] all the mighty men of wealth, of [upon] each man fifty shekels of silver, to give to the king of Assyria. So the king of Assyria turned back, and 21 stayed not there in the land. And the rest of the acts of Menahem, and all that he did, are they not written in the book of the Chronicles of the kings of Israel?
 22 And Menahem slept with his fathers; and Pekahiah his son reigned in his stead.
 23 In the fiftieth year of Azariah king of Judah, Pekahiah the son of Menahem began to reign [became king] over Israel in Samaria, and reigned two years.
 24 And he did that which was evil in the sight of the Lord: he departed not from 25 the sins of Jeroboam the son of Nebat, who made Israel to sin. But Pekah the son of Remaliah, a captain of his, conspired against him, and smote him in Samaria, in the palace [citadel] of the king's house, [together] with Argob and Arieah, and with him [i. e. Pekah there were] fifty men of the Gileadites: and he
 26 killed him, and reigned in his room. And the rest of the acts of Pekahiah, and all that he did, behold, they are written in the book of the Chronicles of the kings of Israel.
 27 In the two and fiftieth year of Azariah king of Judah, Pekah the son of Remaliah began to reign [became king] over Israel in Samaria, and reigned 28 twenty years. And he did that which was evil in the sight of the Lord: he departed not from the sins of Jeroboam the son of Nebat, who made Israel to 29 sin. In the days of Pekah king of Israel came Tiglath-pileser king of Assyria, and took Ijon, and Abel-beth-maachah, and Janosh, and Kedesh, and Hazor, and Gilead, and Galilee,* all the land of Naphtali, and carried them captive to 30 Assyria. And Hoshea the son of Elah made a conspiracy against Pekah the son of Remaliah, and smote him, and slew him, and reigned [became king] in his
 31 stead, in the twentieth year of Jotham the son of Uzziah. And the rest of the acts of Pekah, and all that he did, behold, they are written in the book of the Chronicles of the kings of Israel.
 32 In the second year of Pekah the son of Remaliah king of Israel began [omit began] Jotham the son of Uzziah king of Judah to reign [became king].
 33 Five and twenty years old was he when he began to reign [became king], and he reigned sixteen years in Jerusalem. And his mother's name was Jerusha, 34 the daughter of Zadok. And he did that which was right in the sight of the 35 Lord: he did according [like] to all that his father Uzziah had done. Howbeit the high places were not removed: the people sacrificed and burned incense still in the high places. He built the higher [upper] gate of the house of the Lord.
 36 Now the rest of the acts of Jotham, and all that he did, are they not written in 37 the book of the Chronicles of the kings of Judah? In those days the Lord began to send against Judah Rezin the king of Syria, and Pekah the son of 38 Remaliah. And Jotham slept with his fathers, and was buried with his fathers in the city of David his father: and Ahaz his son reigned in his stead.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

* Ver. 5.—[חֲסִידָיו], for which 2 Chron. xxvi. 31 has חֲסִידָיו, is an abstract noun, "sickness." Cf. Ev. § 165, a and אֲחֻזַּת הַחֲסִידָיו בֵּית הַחֲסִידָיו therefore means house of sickness, hospital. So Gesen., Thomsen, Bunsen, and others. Hengstenberg and Kell understand it to mean, "house of freedom," i. e., in which those dwell who are freed or released from human obligation. It is clear how artificial and forced such an explanation is. Bähr (see Beag. on the verse) takes it as the English translators did, "separate," but חֲסִידָיו, although it means free, comes to that idea from another side. Its primary meaning is to be loosened, lax, and so free from bonds. Hence, by a connection of thought which is often found, it means, when applied to the body, having the natural conserving forces weakened and relaxed, i. e., to be weak, diseased, sick. There is here a certain sense of "free," but not the one which is akin to separate. It is of the utmost importance, in following out the developments of the radical signification of a Hebrew root, not to depart from the true line of its development. The ramifications of different roots approach one another very often, at many points. It is all the more necessary not to pass over from one to the other. בֵּית הַחֲסִידָיו means "house of sickness," a house belonging to the king, standing by itself, no doubt, as a matter of fact, and set apart as his residence under the circumstances of his disease.—W. G. S.]

* Ver. 10.—Before witnesses, or, in public. קָבֵל [lengthened from קָבַל, (which form Gen. gives in the H.-W.-E., and pronounces קֻבַּל) is to be pronounced Quobel (Böttcher, Ewald), and] is equivalent to the Chaldee קָבַל, Dan. ii. 31: iii. 3.—Bähr.

* Ver. 16.—[Note the imperfect פָּתַח after $\text{וְ$. Like the historical present it is used for graphic force, to follow dramatically the succession of events as they arose or came to pass. Ex. § 184, A.

* Vers. 18.—[פָּתַח is impersonal, "because it was not opened," or, "because no opening was made," i. e. because the people did not open the gates for him.

* Ver. 18.—[The art. with the suff. is very rare. See, however, Levit. xxvii. 23; Josh. vii. 21; viii. 23.—Ex. § 290. d. a.

* Vers. 29.—[הַגִּלְגָּלִית —Elsewhere in the O. T. it is always called הַגִּלְגָּלִית . It is not regarded as a fem. and hence the ultima is not accented, though the plural has the form $\text{הַגִּלְגָּלִיתִּים}$.—Ex. § 173, h, 2 and 3, note 1. Böttcher sees in it a peculiarity of the "Ephraimite" dialect (§ 84). In form הַגִּלְגָּלִית is a perfect feminine, but, as the other form was Judaic, that is, classical, the punctuators did not accent this as a feminine. Learb. § 616, 8.—W. G. S.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 1. In the twenty and seventh year of Jeroboam. This chronological statement, although it appears in all the versions and in the massoretic text, is inconsistent with chap. xiv. 2, 17, 23. Amaziah the father of Uzziah ruled in all 29 years (xiv. 2), 14 years contemporaneously with Joash of Israel, and 15 years contemporaneously with his successor, Jeroboam II. (xiv. 17, 23). Amaziah therefore died, and his son Uzziah succeeded him, in the 15th year of the reign of Jeroboam II., not in the 27th. In order to retain the number 27, it has been assumed that there was an interregnum of 11 or 12 years, although there is no mention of any such thing in the history. According to chap. xiv. 20, 21, Uzziah succeeded immediately upon the death of his father, and moreover, if this supposition were to be adopted, we should have to alter all the other chronological statements in chaps. xiv. and xv. Cf. the Excursus on the Chronology, below, after chap. xvii. Evidently there has been an interchange of the numerical signs here, כז , 27, has been put for טו , 15, as Capellus and Grotius supposed, and as all the expositors, even including Keil and Von Gerlach, now assume. [Thenius, adopting this solution of the difficulty, calls attention to the testimony which it bears to the antiquity of the use of טו , instead of יז , to represent 15. The latter being the abbreviation for יחידה , was avoided, as is well known, when it should have occurred in the list of numerals to represent fifteen. If טו ever stood there, of course the inference is good, that, even at a very early time, the superstitious reverence for the name יחידה had gone so far as to produce this change in the mode of writing the number. In fact, however, the change here from 27 to 15 is purely arbitrary. It must be defended by considerations drawn from the context. Any argument in its favor which is deduced from the greater or less resemblance of כז to טו is of little value. Other letters would have as great or greater resemblance. We ought to understand that, when we abandon the text as it stands, we make arbitrary changes, and we must justify them by critical grounds. We only deceive ourselves when we imagine that there is a resemblance between the numerals in the text and those we want to put there, and so persuade ourselves that we have found further support for our conjecture. That number must be put in the place of 27, which the best critical combinations require. The expositors almost all agree in reading 51 (53) for 41 as the duration of Jeroboam's reign, and then in reading 15 for 27 here, because Zachariah succeeded in Uzziah's 38th. See, however, the bracketed note on chap. xiv. 22, and the Appendix on the Chronology.—W. G. S.] Azariah, or Uzziah, was devoted to the worship of Jehovah, as Amaziah was at the commencement of his reign; like him, however, he still permitted the worship upon the high places. See notes on chap. xiv. 3 and 4. The chronicler says that he sought Jehovah so long as the prophet Zachariah lived (2 Chron. xxvi. 5). [The chronicler does not charge him with idolatry at all. He accounts for his leprosy by telling how he trespassed upon the function of the priests. This he did from pride; nevertheless, it was rather too great zeal in the service of Jehovah than too little.—W. G. S.]

Ver. 5. And the Lord touched the king, &c. This did not take place until after Uzziah had accomplished what is narrated in 2 Chron. xxvi. 6-15. The ground which is there given (ver. 16) for the punishment with leprosy is, that he, being puffed up in consequence of his victories and of his powerful position, usurped priestly functions contrary to the law (Numb. xviii. 3, 7), and thereby violated the sanctuary. It is hardly possible that he can have become a leper earlier than the last years of his long reign. His son Jotham, who ruled in his stead during his sickness, was only 25 years old when he became king in his own right by his father's death (ver. 33).— בֵּית הַחֲפָזִית does not mean: sick-house, or pest-house, as it is now generally translated, for חֲפָזִית means to be loose, free, that is, separated (Levit. xix. 20). Neither does it mean house of freedom, or manumission (Hengstenberg, Keil), but house of separation, i. e., a house which stands in the open country, by itself, separate from others. Vulg.: in domo libera seorsum. [See Grammatical note on the verse.] According to the Law (Levit. xiii. 46), the lepers had to dwell apart (בְּרֵד), outside of the city or the camp (2 Kings vii. 3). Probably the house in which the leprous king lived was especially built for him.—And Jotham the king's son was over the house, i. e., he filled one of the highest offices of the court (cf. 1 Kings iv. 6; xviii. 3; 2 Kings xviii. 18)—judging the people of the land (cf. 1 Sam. viii. 6, 20; 1 Kings iii. 9), i. e., Vicarius erat regis, qui a populo segregatus fungi regiam potestatem non poterat (Grotius). As was said above (Pt. II., pp. 88 and 89), this passage bears strongly against the supposition that there occurred, in the Hebrew history, joint-regencies which are not specifically mentioned. Uzziah remained king until his death; up to that event, Jotham was not co-regent, but only the representative of his father.—In the city of David, ver. 7. Instead of this the chronicler says (II. xxvi. 23): "In the field of the burial which belonged to the kings; for they said, He is a leper." Bertheau remarks on this: "He was buried, according to this, near to the royal tombs (with his fathers), because they did not dare to put a king who had died of leprosy in the royal sepulchres, lest they should make them unclean."

Ver. 8. In the thirty and eighth year, &c. In regard to the correctness of this statement, see note on chap. xiv. 23. The assassinations of kings which had been perpetrated before this, had taken place in secret, but this one was carried out in public, that is to say, boldly and without fear. The people saw it perpetrated without opposing it. The Sept. translate quite incorrectly: καὶ ἐπάταξεν αὐτὸν ἐν Κεβλάμ. Ewald considers קְבֻלָּה a proper name, because קְבֻלָּה has not the article [and because קְבֻלָּה does not "occur elsewhere in prose," and because the Sept. take it as a proper name]. He believes it to be the name of the "third king during that month" [see Zach. xi. 8]. He translates: "And Kobolam slew him." Not to speak of any other objection to this, we should then expect to be told whose son he was, as in the similar cases, vers. 14, 25, and 30. [Stanley is the only scholar who has followed Ewald in this invention. The facts referred to in support of it are not by any means without weight, but the invention of another king is too ponderous a solution for them. Yet it is remarkable to notice that a form from the root קבל forms a part of certain Assyrian proper names. (See the list of Assyrian kings at the end of vol. I. of Lenormant's Manual of the History of the East, with foot-note thereon.) However, to take קְבֻלָּה as a proper name in the place before us renders the passage awkward and unnatural.—W. G. S.] Thenius arbitrarily pronounces ver. 12 to be an addition by the "redactor." It refers back very significantly to chap. x. 30. Zachariah was the fourth and last descendant of Jehu upon the throne of Israel.

Ver. 13. Shallum the son of Jabesh, &c. As the one month, during which Shallum reigned, falls in the thirty-ninth year of the reign of Uzziah, the six months, during which Zachariah was king (ver. 8), must be placed in the last part of the 38th year of Uzziah's reign; probably some of them fall even in the beginning of the 39th. According to Josephus, Shallum was a friend (φίλος) of Zachariah, and put him to death by taking advantage of this relation. When Menahem, ὁ στρατηγός (i. e., the commander-in-chief), who was then in Tirzah, heard this, he started up with his entire force, and marched to Samaria, καὶ συμβαλὼν εἰς μάχην ἀναιρεῖ τὸν Σίλλουμον; after he had made himself king, ἐκείθεν εἰς Θαιφάν παραγίνεται πόλιν. Tirzah lay in the neighborhood of Samaria. See above, note on 1 Kings xiv. 17.—Then Menahem, ver. 16, i. e., after he had made himself master of the throne. The verse contains a further continuation of ver. 14, and tells more definitely what Menahem did, after he had killed Shallum, in order to become ruler of the country. This event does not belong to the reign of Menahem, for the story of that does not begin until the 17th verse, but it belongs to the incidents connected with his taking possession of the throne. It follows that Tiphshah is not the celebrated Thapsacus on the Euphrates (as it is in 1 Kings v. 4; see note thereon), as has often been supposed, and as Keil [and Rawlinson] yet maintain. Menahem could not, at any time, have undertaken an expedition against this far distant city, which formed the utmost limit of the kingdom of Solomon; least of all could he have undertaken this just after ascending the throne. He had enough to do to establish his usurped authority on a firm basis. Most commentators, therefore, correctly judge that Tiphshah was a city near Tirzah, of which, as of so many others which are mentioned but once, nothing further is known. The name תִּפְשָׁה, trajectus, ford, "may, in view of its appellative force, have been applied to many towns which lay near to fords" (Winer). There is not sufficient reason for believing that "תִּפְשָׁה is an error for תִּפְחָה," a town on the border between Ephraim and Manasseh, Jos. xvii. 7, 8 (Thenius).—קְבֻלָּה cannot be translated otherwise than as in ver. 14. It does not therefore mean: "from Tirzah on," i. e., to Tiphshah, but: "starting out from Tirzah," and it is to be joined with יָבֵה, not with נִבְרָה. The meaning of the passage is, therefore, this: When Menahem heard of the events which had happened in Samaria, he marched from Tirzah with his army, or a part of it, to Samaria, and there slew Shallum. Then he went back to Tirzah and marched out with his entire force to reduce the country to obedience to himself. In Tiphshah he met with obstinate resistance, but took the city by storm (Josephus: κατὰ κράτος), and chastised it and the surrounding territory in a horrible manner (Josephus: ὠμότητος ὑπερβολὴν οὐ καταλιπὼν οὐδὲ ἀγρότητας). He thereby frightened any others who might have been intending to resist, and so established himself on the throne. We have mention of a similar cruelty towards pregnant women in chap. viii. 12; Hos. xiv. 1 [E. V. xiii. 16]; Amos i. 13. If newspaper reports may be believed, a guerilla captain in Michoacan, Mexico, did the same thing in the year 1861.

Ver. 17. In the nine and thirtieth year, &c. On the duration of Menahem's reign, see note on

ver. 23. The closing words of ver. 18: קְבֻלָּה

are nowhere else added to the stereotyped formula which recurs in that verse, although they would hold just as true of any of the other kings of Israel as of Menahem. The Sept. join the words to the following verse, and translate: ἐν ταῖς ἡμέραις αὐτοῦ ἀνέβη Φοῖβη. They therefore read וַיָּבֵי, and Thenius and Keil, referring also to ver. 29, agree in regarding this as the original reading of the text. By this change קְבֻלָּה, at the commencement of ver. 19, comes into a good connection of sense, and is not left abrupt; also there is no need for Hitzig's emendation וַיָּבֵי.—Pul (ver. 19) is the first Assyrian king who is mentioned in the Old Testament. In fact this is the first reference to the Assyrians in the history of the Israelites. Since they had to come through Syria in order to reach Palestine, it follows that they must have reduced that country to subjection, and extended their power on this side of the Euphrates; i. e., Assyria must have commenced to take the position of a great world-monarchy. [Assyria had begun to take the position of a world-monarchy, but it must be understood that these expeditions were raids rather than complete conquests. Tribute was imposed and then the defeated nation was left intact. It refused the tribute as soon as it dared and then a new expedition was made against it. It was only after a long period of this vassal relationship that a conquered country was incorporated as a province of the empire. Accordingly very few were ever thus treated at all. The expression for incorporation used in the inscriptions is to "treat them like the Assyrians."—W. G. S.] Hosea (viii. 10) calls the king of Assyria "The king of princes." ["King of kings" is a standing epithet of the Assyrian monarchs upon their monuments.] It has often been inferred from Hos. v. 13; vii. 11; viii. 9 that Menahem invited the Assyrians to support him against other aspirants to the crown (Thenius), and that Pul came "to help the king to restore order" (Ewald). This notion is controverted by the expression וַיִּהְיוּ עִמָּוֹתָיו, which is used of a hostile coming and attack, Gen. xxiv. 25; Judges xviii. 27; Isai. x. 28; Job ii. 11. In I Chron. v. 26, Pul's coming is distinctly referred to as a hostile attack. Menahem induced the mighty enemy to withdraw from the country by a large sum of money, and then secured his alliance against internal and external foes. This last is what Hosea calls Israel's going to Assyria. A thousand talents of silver are about two or two and a half million thalers [$1,440,000 or $1,800,000. The value of the talent is not surely and definitely known.]

Menahem imposed this sum as a tax (מַעֲבָדִים, he made the money go out) upon the "able ones" in Israel. יְהוֹיָכִן הַחַיִּל are not here the mighty men of the army, but those who were strong in wealth (Job xx. 15; Ruth ii. 1). Either there were no treasuries then in Israel, or, if there were any, they were empty. Menahem did not include the poor in this tax, in order that he might not excite discontent, and might not have to use force to collect it. Each man fifty shekels of silver. As a talent contained 3,000 shekels, there must have been 60,000 "mighty men of wealth." The interpretation, that Menahem paid to Pul 50 shekels for every soldier in his army (Richter), is incorrect. It is often inferred, though incorrectly, from I Chron. v. 26, that Pul, on his departure, took away Reuben and Gad and the half of Manasseh. This deed is ascribed there, as here, to Tiglath Pileser (see Bertheau on that passage). The assertion of the Cabv. Bibel that "this entire occurrence was prophesied in Amos vii. 1-3," has little or no foundation.

Ver. 23. In the fiftieth year of Azariah, &c. As Menahem became king, according to ver. 17, in the 39th of Uzziah, and ruled 10 years, we expect here the 49th year. Keil assumes that "some months passed between the death of Menahem and the accession of Pekahiah; probably because of the disorder which prevailed at the time, and which made this accession difficult." We prefer to suppose that Menahem became king in the last months of the 39th year of Uzziah, and reigned for a month or two into his 50th, i. e., a few months over ten years. [This changes the form of the difficulty, but does not do away with it at all. If the facts had been as is here supposed, the Jewish mode of reckoning would have made Menahem's reign 11 or 12 years in duration. There is a discrepancy which we cannot explain. We must either change the text, or pass it over, taking 10 years as the length of the reign and neglecting the other statement. The attempted explanations are futile.—W. G. S.] On וַיִּהְיוּ עִמָּוֹתָיו, ver. 25, see Exeg.

note on I Kings ix. 22. It is not apposition to Remaliah (as Luther took it), but to Pekah. The citadel of the king's house is not the harem (Ewald). It is the fortified part of the palace into which Pekahiah fled when the conspirators approached (cf. I Kings xvi. 18). [So far as we know there was no part of the Oriental palaces which was, in any proper sense, fortified. The Assyrian palaces which have been exhumed consist of three independent yet connected buildings, a hall of audience or business, a servants' house, and the harem. The last was the most strictly enclosed and carefully guarded, and was the strongest for defence. It was connected by an enclosed cloister with the first mentioned building. If we may judge from this of the arrangement of a Samaritan palace, the מַרְמֶכֶת was the harem or included it.—W. G. S.]

Josephus gives as the reason for his short reign of two years: τῇ τοῦ πατρὸς κατακολονδρίας ὀμότητι. Argob and Arieah were no doubt high officials, and influential friends of the king, whose opposition was to be feared, and whom Pekah, therefore, put to death together with (אֶת) the king. The following וַיִּהְיוּ עִמָּוֹתָיו shows that they were not fellow-conspirators of Pekah (as many have supposed) who, with him, murdered the king. The fifty Gileadites probably belonged to the body-guard which was under the command of Pekah. The Gileadites, who were stout soldiers (I Chron. xii. 8; xxvi. 31; Josh. xvii. 1), were employed in this department of the service.

Ver. 27. In the two and fiftieth year, &c. On the chronological data in vers. 27 and 30, see below, after chap. xvii. The following may suffice here: Pekah is said (ver. 27) to have reigned only 20 years. But, according to ver. 32, he reigned two years before Jotham. The latter reigned 16 years. According to chap. xvii. 1, Pekah's successor, Hoshea, came to the throne in the 12th year of Jotham's successor Ahaz. But $2 + 16 + 12 = 30$. We are therefore compelled to conclude that the time from the accession of Pekah to that of Hoshea was thirty years. All the commentators agree in this. Then, either Pekah ruled 30 instead of 20 years, or he reigned 20 years and there was an interval of 10 years before the accession of his successor, Hoshea, during which there was no king in Israel, and, as those who adopt this view agree, there was anarchy. Ver. 30, however, contradicts this latter hypothesis, for it is there said that Hoshea slew Pekah and reigned in his stead, not after an interval of 10 years, but as soon as he had killed him. The history does not hint at any period of strife or anarchy, although such a period must have presented incidents worth recording. We do not hesitate, therefore, to assume here, as in ver. 1, that an error in copying has been made. The error here, in writing כ, 20, for ל, 30, is one which could take place more easily than the one we discovered there (Thenius). All the other chronological data are consistent with 30 in this place, as we shall see below, on chap. xvii. [See the translator's addition below at the end of this Exeg. section.]

Ver. 29. In the days of Pekah . . . came Tiglath Pileser. This Assyrian king was the successor of Pul. To which of the Assyrian dynasties he belonged, and whether he was the last of the dynasty of the Dercetadæ, are questions which do not interest us here [?] (Keil on the passage). The signification of the name Tiglath-pileser (or, as the chronicler writes it, Tilgath-pileser) is uncertain. According to Gesenius, Tiglath is equivalent to Diglath, the Tigris river, and pileser means lord: "Lord of the Tigris river." According to Fürst, Tiglath means acer, fortis.—[This is the etymological meaning of Diglath, applied to the Tigris from its swiftness. See the dictionaries on תִּגְלַת.—פָּל, arcere, and אֲכָר, prince; together: "The chief, as mighty defender." According to others, Diglath is the name for the goddess Derceto, or Atargatis. [The name is transcribed from the cuneiform by Lenormant: Tuklat-pal-ashir; by Smith: Tukulti-pal-zara; by Rawlinson: Tiglat-pal-zira. Rawlinson (Five Great Monarchies, II. 539) gives the etymology thus:

Tiglat is worship, or adoration (Chald. תִּגְלַת, to trust (in); pal is son (of this there is no doubt; it occurs in scores of names); zira is obscure; Sir H. Rawlinson thinks that it means lord, "as Zirat certainly means lady." However this last may be, Pal-zira, as a compound, was an epithet of the god Nin (= Hercules), and the king's name would mean: "Worship to Hercules." This is the only explanation yet offered which is anything more than a guess.—W. G. S.] On fon and Abel-beth-maachah, see notes on 1 Kings xv. 20. Janoah cannot be the town on the border between Ephraim and Manasseh, which is mentioned Josh. xvi. 6 sq., for all the cities here mentioned were in the northern part of Palestine; it probably lay near those which have been mentioned. Kedesh was a free, levitical city in the tribe of Naphtali (Josh. xix. 37; xx. 7; xxi. 32); on the western bank of the sea of Merom (Robinson, Palest. III. 355). On Hazor see note on 1 Kings ix. 15. Gilead with the article is not a city but the territory east of the Jordan which Jeroboam II. had recovered to Israel (chap. xiv. 25). On Galilee, or Galilæa, see note on 1 Kings ix. 11. All the land of Naphtali is an explanatory apposition to Galilæa. The places are mentioned in the order in which they were conquered. The incident which is here narrated coincides with that in chap. xvi. 9 (see Maurer on that verse) and belongs to the last years of Pekah's reign. Perhaps it gave occasion to Hosea's conspiracy against him. The chronological statement in ver. 30: in the twentieth year of Jotham, cannot be correct, for Jotham only reigned 16 years. See further, notes on chap. xvii.

Ver. 32. In the second year of Pekah, &c. On the section vers. 32-38 see the parallel narrative in 2 Chron. xxvii. 1-9, which contributes further information in regard to Jotham. To the words: He did like to all that his father Uzziah had done, the Chronicler adds: "howbeit he entered not into the temple of the Lord," i. e., into the inner sanctuary, by which it is meant to say that he did not usurp priestly functions as Uzziah had done (2 Chron. xxvi. 16). He did not abolish the worship on the heights (ver. 4 and chap. xiv. 4). He built the upper gate, i. e., he restored it, he rebuilt it more splendidly, for it could not well be meant to assert that he built it at this time, and that there had been none before. תִּגְלַת is not the highest gate, nor the chief gate, but "the upper one," perhaps because it was toward the north, towards that part of the temple rock, which, as compared with the south side, was higher. (Bertheau, on 2 Chron. xvii. 3). ["King Solomon's palace was evidently at a lower level than the temple, and therefore (2 Chron. xxvii. 3) king Jotham may still have built much upon the wall." (Jerusalem Restored, p. 222).] According to Ezek., xl. 38 sq., the sacrifices were slain at this gate. (Cf. Ezek. ix. 2; viii. 5.) This is probably the reason why Jotham made it especially beautiful. In Jerem. xx. 2 it is called the gate of Benjamin. It must not be confused with the gate דָּרֵךְ, chap. xi. 6, for this was adjoining the palace (see Ezek. note on that ver.).—In those days (ver. 37), i. e., towards the end of Jotham's reign, Jehovah began 'to send against Judah the confederated Israelites and Syrians, i. e., he brought this chastisement upon Judah (Levit. xxvi. 22; Amos viii. 11). Rezin; "the name of the founder of the dynasty (1 Kings xi. 23) [rather of the founder of the monarchy. There had been more than one dynasty.] appears again, slightly altered, in him who was to close it" (Thenius). The attacks were begun under Jotham; under his successor Ahaz (chap. xvi.) they first became threatening to the kingdom. As the Assyrians had already once penetrated into Palestine (ver. 19), and as Ahaz once more called on them for aid against Rezin and Pekah (chap. xvi. 7), we must suppose that the Syrians had, in the mean time, freed themselves once more from the Assyrian yoke (see notes on ver. 19). This had probably become possible for them because the Assyrians, on account of the revolt of the Medes and Babylonians, were prevented for a time from maintaining their authority. Tiglath Pileser reconquered Damascus (chap. xvi. 9).

[SUPPLEMENTARY NOTE on the references to Assyrian history contained in chap. xv.—The references to contemporaneous history which occur in the text are of the highest value for the solution of the chronological difficulties, and for the elucidation of the history. Every such reference, therefore, requires our most careful attention. In the three years since the German edition of this volume was published most important contributions have been made to our knowledge, especially of Assyrian history. It is difficult to understand how the German author could lay aside all notice of the results which had been attained, even at that time, and refuse to take notice of them. The time has now certainly come when biblical scholars must give them attention, and a summary of the information we possess is given in a series of notes at the end of the Exegetical sections on the next few chapters.*

* Of works which are available to the English student for acquiring a more detailed acquaintance with history contemporaneous to that of the Israelitish monarchy, we may mention the following: a) Prof. Gen. Rawlinson's Five Great Monarchies of the Ancient World. (4 Vols. Murray: London, 1864. 2d ed. 1871.) This work is based on the investigations and opinions of Sir H. Rawlinson. The first edition has been already to some extent superseded by later discoveries. b) Manual of Ancient History, by the same (Harpers' reprint, 1871). This is a small and convenient work. A large part of it is taken up with the history of Greece and Rome, and the history of the Oriental nations is so much epitomized that it is hardly available for any who are not already familiar with the history from other sources. It is not consistent in its chronology. It adopts the "short period" for Assyrian history, but has not ventured to depart from the received chronology for the Israelitish

Pul (ver. 19) is the first king of Assyria who is mentioned in the Book of Kings, though we know from the monuments and inscriptions that Ahab and Jehu both came in contact with the Assyrian world-monarchy. (See notes 5 and 12 on the Chronological Table, and p. 114 of PART II.) No such king is mentioned in any inscription which has yet been found, and no such one is named in the Canon (See Appendix on the Chronology, § 4). Rawlinson (Five Great Monarchies, II, p. 385 sq.) thinks that the identification with certain known kings of Assyria, which has been attempted, is unsatisfactory, but does not dispose definitely of the question. In the Manual, Pul is not mentioned among the kings of Assyria though he is mentioned in the section on "Judaea." Oppert offers a solution of the difficulty. He gives credit to the story of the "first destruction of Nineveh" by the Chaldeans and Medes. According to his identification of the eclipse mentioned in the Canon (App. on the Chron., § 4.), the date of this would be 789. The accession of Tiglath Pileser II. in 747-5 is beyond dispute. The gap between 789 and 747 is filled by inserting Pul, a Chaldean (the name is not Assyrian in form), who is supposed to have remained in Assyria after the destruction of Nineveh as ruler of the country. This, such as it is, is the best conjecture to account for the king mentioned in ver. 19.

Tiglath Pileser II. (ver. 29) was, according to Rawlinson, a usurper, according to Lenormant, a descendant of the ancient Assyrian dynasty. His reign dates from 745-4, but he may have been engaged for two or three years before that time in securing the throne. He reigned until 727. He is said in the text to have come into Syria and Samaria in the reign of Pekah. This is the first instance we find of that policy of deportation which the Assyrians and Babylonians afterwards practised so much. It was not generally, or certainly had not been up to this time, the policy of the Assyrians to destroy the nationality of the nations which they subdued. (See bracketed note on ver. 19.) They made expeditions against certain nations which they plundered and made tributary, but which they then left undisturbed so long as the tribute was paid. It was only after long vassalage, and repeated revolts and reconquests, that nations were incorporated as provinces in the Assyrian empire.

We are now promised from the Assyrian inscriptions a solution of one of the most perplexing discrepancies in the chronological statements of the monarchy in order to bring them into accord. (See notes 5 and 15 on the Chronological Table at the end of this volume, and the Appendix on the Chronology. Both these works are marked by a certain timidity and want of independence. c) Lenormant's Manual of the Ancient History of the East; English edition edited by Chevallier Asher: London, 2 vols.; Vol. I., 1869; Vol. II., 1870. This edition to which the references in this volume apply, is printed by Lippincott.) The French edition (Levy: Paris, 1871) is accompanied by an excellent historical atlas. This work is based chiefly upon the researches of Oppert, but contains also original investigations and independent judgment. It presents a very satisfactory statement of the present state of our knowledge, and is in style and method very available as a student's manual. The caution needs to be borne in mind, however, in using it, that assured facts and hypothetical conjecture are sometimes combined to produce a smooth narrative, and that the reader has little warning as to which is which. It is very conservative in its religious and theological attitude, and the English edition follows the E. V. sometimes even where it is certainly incorrect.

text, and one which, if correct, at the same time supplies an omission in the historical narrative. It is said that Pekah reigned for 20 years (ver. 37), but it is stated also that he came to the throne in the 52d of Azariah, who reigned for 52 years. In chap. 17, 1, it is said that Hoshea (Pekah's successor) came to the throne in the 12th of Ahaz. In the mean time Jotham reigned for 16 years. But $1+16+12=29$ or 28 years interval for Pekah's reign. This difficulty has never been solved; it has only been put aside by the assumption of an interregnum after the death of Pekah.

Oppert claims to have discovered the explanation in certain statements of the inscriptions. Lenormant adopts his results, but Rawlinson does not. "It is found that the reign of Pekah was interrupted for more than 7 years; that about 742 he was deposed by a second Menahem, probably a son of Pekahiah, who was placed on the throne by Tiglath Pileser II., king of Assyria, to whom he paid tribute as vassal. In 733 a new revolution dethroned him and restored Pekah. The latter, openly hostile to the Assyrians, whose vassal he had dethroned, made an alliance with Rezin, king of Damascus. These two princes, even in the time of Pekah's first reign, had formed the design of overturning the throne of the House of David, and installing as king in Jerusalem a certain son of Tabeel (his own name is given in the inscription—Ashariah), a creature of their own (see ver. 37, where they seem to have formed the plan before Jotham's death, and Isai. vii. 1-6), in order, probably, to oppose a more compact force to the Assyrians." (Lenormant, I. 172; cf. also 389.) See note 15 on the Chron. Table. In the last column of the table the chronology of the events of this period is given according to this scheme. In the second alliance and revolt of Rezin and Pekah, in 733, they resumed the plan of attacking Judah. Ahaz called for Tiglath Pileser's aid (see note after Ezek. on chap. xvi.), and that monarch marched into Damascus. He put Rezin to death, made Damascus a province, forced many of the chief inhabitants of Syria, northern, and trans-Jordanic Israel to emigrate into Armenia, and, though he left Pekah on the throne, reduced the kingdom of Israel to the district of Samaria. Pekah was present as a vassal at Tiglath Pileser's court in Damascus in 730.

"Towards the end of 730, Muthon, king of Tyre, made an alliance with Pekah, king of Israel, and they both refused their tribute to the Assyrians. Tiglath Pileser did not consider this revolt of sufficient importance to require his own presence. He contented himself with sending an army into Palestine. On the approach of this force a conspiracy was formed in Samaria, headed by Hoshea, who, after killing Pekah, possessed himself of the crown. The Assyrian king confirmed him in this position, and Muthon, finding himself without an ally, attempted no resistance, and quickly submitted to pay his tribute." (Lenormant, I. 391.)—For continuation see Supp. Note after the Ezek. section on chap. xvi.—W. G. S.]

HISTORICAL AND ETHICAL

1. This chapter contains rather a succinct review of several reigns than a detailed account of them. Although we have very little specific information in regard to the character and conduct of the kings mentioned, yet we have a statement about each one in respect to his attitude towards the fundamental law, or constitution, of Israel, that is, towards the covenant of Jehovah. This is always stated in a stereotyped formula. Hence we see that this point was the most important one, in the eyes of the author, in regard to any king, and that, in reviewing or estimating his reign, he laid most stress on this inquiry: How did he stand towards the covenant with Jehovah—the constitution of Israel? After the death of Jeroboam II. the decline of the Kingdom of the Ten Tribes went on without interruption. From the reign of Zachariah on, the kingdom was in the progress of dissolution. The author therefore hastens more rapidly over the period of these kings, of whom three, indeed, only reigned for a very short time, and gives only those facts in regard to them which bear either upon the chief question mentioned above, or upon the approaching catastrophe. For everything beyond this he refers to the original authorities. It is true that he follows the same course in regard to Uzziah and Jotham, who belonged, according to the Chronicler, to the number of energetic and efficient rulers, but this is to be explained, first, by the fact that he treats the history of Judah with less detail from the time of the division of the kingdom on, and, secondly, by the character of the activity of these two kings, which was directed almost exclusively to the external and political prosperity of the nation, not to the restoration and complete realization of the theocracy, which was, for this author, the matter of chief interest. From what the Chronicler gives in addition, we cannot see that the religious and moral life took any new flair under their rule, or reached any more vigorous development. Both were, it is true, favorable to the worship of Jehovah, but they lacked decided zeal for it, for “the people still sacrificed and offered incense upon the heights;” i. e., they did nothing to abolish a form of worship which could so easily lead to error. The external prosperity which they produced and fostered caused carelessness, luxury, forgetfulness of God, and immorality of every kind, just as the same causes had produced these vices in Israel under Jeroboam II. This we see from the descriptions of the prophets (see Isai. ii-v.). A slow corruption and demoralization was making its way in Judah. It became evident, and bore fruit under the next king, Ahaz. His successor, Hezekiah, was the first to bring the Mosaic constitution into full and efficient working, hence the author narrates in detail the reign of this genuine theocratic king (cf. chaps. xviii., xix., and xx.).

[Ewald (Gesch. III. s. 634) thus describes the state of Judah under Uzziah: At this time the people turned their attention to money-getting “not so much, as had formerly been the case, in particular provinces and districts, but throughout the country, even in Judah, and not so much because a single king like Solomon favored commercial undertakings, as because the love of trade and gain, and the desire for the easy enjoyment of the greatest possible amount of wealth, had taken possession of all classes. All the scorn poured out by the prophets upon this haste to be rich, and all their rebukes of the tendency to cheat, which was one of the fruits of it, no longer availed to restore the ancient simplicity and contentment (Hos. xii. 8; Isai. ii. 7). The long and fortunate reign of Uzziah in Judah was very favorable to the growth of this love of gain and enjoyment. The quick interchange of money in the lower classes, and the fierce struggle for gain which gradually absorbed the entire people, stimulated the upper classes to similar attempts. Many were the complaints in Judah of the injustice of the judges, and of the oppression of the helpless (Amos iii. 1; vi. 1; Hos. v. 10; cf. also Ps. xii.). There was a perverse and mocking disposition prevalent which led men to throw doubt upon everything and to raise objections to everything (Amos vi. 3; ix. 10; Hos. iv. 4). It made them treat with harsh contempt the rebukes and exhortations of the best prophets, as we feel distinctly from the whole tone of the writings of Amos, Hosea, and Isaiah. It led them to desire to know heathen religions, and to introduce foreign divinities, even when the king himself held aloof from any such movement (Amos ii. 4; Hos. iv. 15; vi. 11; xii. 1; Isai. ii. 8). It became more and more difficult to restrain these tendencies.”]

2. The only incident which is mentioned during the long reign of Uzziah is that God touched him (וַיִּבֹּא), and that he was a leper until his death. It follows that this fact must have seemed to the author to be important before all others. Leprosy is not, for him, an accidental disease, but a divine judgment for guilt, as it is often described (Numb. xii. 10; Deut. xxiv. 8, 9; 2 Sam. iii. 29; 2 Kings v. 27). He does not tell more particularly what the sin of the king was, perhaps because it was baleful to the king alone and personally, and not to the whole people, like the sin of Jeroboam. He rests with a simple reference to the original documents. [The author of the Book of Kings regards Uzziah's sickness as a visitation of Providence, just as he regards any other affliction, or any piece of good fortune, as something sent by God. He does not know of any guilt on the part of Uzziah for which this was a judgment. He simply mentions it as a matter of interest in itself, and in its connection with the fact, otherwise unparalleled in the history of the monarchy (unless Uzziah was made king while his father was a captive), that the king's son exercised royal functions during his father's life-time. He does not hint at any belief on his part that this was a proof that the king had been guilty of some sin, and it does not behoove us to draw any such inference.—W. G. S.] On the contrary, the Chronicler (2 Chron. xxvi. 16 sq.) gives a detailed explanation of the cause of this visitation. According to him the king, who had become arrogant and puffed up by his prosperity and by the power he had attained, was no longer contented with the royal authority, but sought, as an absolute ruler, to combine with it the highest priestly authority and functions, as the heathen kings did. The institution of the levitical priesthood, however, formed an essential part of the theocratic constitution, and the monarchy, which was, moreover, not established until much later, was not justified in attempting to absorb the priestly office and to overthrow its independence. Uzziah's guilt, therefore, did not consist in a single illegal action, but in an assault upon the constitution. A principle was at stake, whose violation would have opened a cleft in the theocratic constitution. According to Josephus, Uzziah went into the sanctuary (holy-place), on a great feast-day, before the entire people, ἐνδὲς ἱερουσὴν ὁρᾶν, and offered incense there upon the golden altar. [Thenius calls attention to the remarkable detail in the account of this incident in Josephus. Josephus says that the earthquake which is mentioned in Amos i. 1, and Zach. xiv. 5, as having occurred during Uzziah's reign, took place at the moment of his quarrel with the priests; that it broke the roof of the temple, and that a ray of sun-light penetrated this, fell upon the head of the king, and produced the leprosy.] No former king had ventured to make such an assault upon the independent authority of the priesthood. Thenius says: "It is most probable that the powerful king desired to reassume the high-priest's functions which had been executed by David and Solomon," but this is decidedly false, for there is no hint anywhere that David and Solomon executed priestly functions in the holy place, or in the holy of holies; in fact, there is nothing in the whole Old Testament about any "chief-priestly authority of the kings." (See notes on the passage 1 Kings ix. 25.) It was not, therefore, "any improper self-assertion on the part of the priests against the king" (Ewald). They did right to resist him. On the other hand, it was a usurpation on the part of the king to attempt any such violence upon the rights and functions of the priesthood which God had appointed. It was as much the right as it was the duty of the priests not to allow any such invasion of their prerogatives, and if they resisted the powerful and revered monarch, their courage deserves to be honored. Moreover, it was not they, but Jehovah, who smote the king with leprosy, and he was now compelled to abandon not only the priestly, but also the royal functions.

3. Witsius (Decaphyl. p. 320) says of the five kings who followed Zachariah: non tam reges fuere quam fures, latrones ac tyranni, Augusto regum nomine indigni; qui tyrannidem male partam neque melius habitam fœde amiserunt. They all persevered in the sin of Jeroboam, which was, from the very commencement of the kingdom, the germ of its ruin. It is to them that the prophet's words apply: "They have set up kings, but not by me; they have made princes and I knew it not" (Hos. viii. 4). Only one of them died a natural death and left the succession to his son, who, in his turn, could only retain the sceptre for a short time. Of the others, each one killed his predecessor in order to gain the crown, the authority of which was, in the mean time, shattered by these commotions. One of the most important factors in the history of this period is the conflict, with the rising Assyrian monarchy, which came to assist the internal dissension in hurrying the nation to its downfall. Assyria was destined, in the purpose of God, to be the instrument for inflicting the long-threatened judgment. Invited, probably, by the internal weakness and distraction which commenced under Zachariah, Pul made the first invasion during the reign of Menahem; he could only be bribed to withdraw by a heavy tribute. The second Assyrian, Tiglath Pileser, came during Pekah's reign; he could not be satisfied with money, but carried off a large portion of the inhabitants into captivity. The third, Shalmaneser, came during Hoshea's reign, captured Samaria, and put an end to the kingdom forever (chap. xvii. 6). [See the bracketed addition at the end of the Exegetical section, above.]

4. Not a single event of the reign of Zachariah, which, in fact, only lasted for six months, is mentioned. It is, however, stated expressly that with him the house of Jehu expired, according to the words of the prophet, chap. x. 30, and not by dying out, but in a violent and bloody way (Hos. i. 4; Amos vii. 9). This was also an actual confirmation of the declaration in the fundamental law of Israel, that God visits the sins of the fathers upon the children unto the third and fourth generation (Ex. xx. 5; xxxiv. 7; Deut. v. 9); that is, the sin against the first and chief commandment: "Thou shalt have none other Gods before me, and shalt not make to thyself any graven image" [the first commandment, according to the Lutheran division]. This commandment was the foundation of the covenant with Israel and the centre of the Israelitish nationality. The meaning is, therefore, that the "sin of Jeroboam" will not be permitted by God to run on beyond the third or fourth generation (cf. Menken, Schriften, V. s. 35). No dynasty in Israel which followed the sin of Jeroboam lasted for more than three or four generations. The house of Jeroboam, like that of Baesha and Menahem, perished with its first member; the house of Omri with its third, and the house of Jehu with its fourth. Zimri, Shallum, Pekah, and Hoshea died without successors, while the house of David remained without [long] interruption upon the throne. Although single kings in the line were guilty of apostasy, yet the sin was never continued until the second generation. [On the physical calamities which marked the last years of Jehu's dynasty, and on the death of Zachariah, see Stanley, II. 400-403.]

5. Shallum, the king of a month, had no historical importance further than this, that he murdered and was murdered. Both these facts go to show, what the author desires to show, the state in which the kingdom then was. The history makes special mention of only two events in the history of Menahem, although he reigned for ten years, but these two events are characteristic of him and of the state of the kingdom. The first is his campaign against Tiphshah, the city which would not admit him, that is, would not recognize him as king. We see from this that he was not at all beloved, and that the land was already distracted by parties. The fact that he there perpetrated a great massacre, and did not even spare the infant in its mother's womb, and so raged against his own countrymen after the manner of the most savage foreign foes, shows that he was a bloody tyrant, who desired from the outset to fill all his opponents with terror. Machiavelli's words (De principe, 8) apply to him: "He who violently and without just right usurps a crown, must use cruelty, if cruelty becomes necessary, once for all, in order that he may not find it necessary to recommence the use of it daily." The second fact mentioned in regard to this reign, one which had decisive influence upon the fate of the whole nation, is the contact with Assyria. Menahem pressed from his subjects a large sum of money, in order not only to bribe the Assyrian king to leave his territory, but also to purchase his support and assistance against his subjects themselves. He was the first king of Israel who, in order to hold his people in subjection and establish his own authority, purchased the assistance of a foreign power. "In order to establish his authority, at the price of the independence of his people, he founded his power upon the Assyrian support" (Duncker). It was against this course that the prophet Hosea pronounced his intense denunciations (v. 13; vii. 11; x. 6). Instead of establishing the kingdom securely by these means, the king only hastened its ruin, for "it has always been thus in the history of the world; the protection of mighty nations has only been the first step towards oppression by them. Such protection has often been, as it was here for Israel, a punishment for those who sought it" (Calw. Bibel). Starke's observation: "Menahem acts prudently here, not only in purchasing the departure of the invader with money, but also in laying the tribute as a tax upon his wealthy subjects," entirely misses the historical connection. Ewald says: "Menahem seemed at first to be inspired with better principles, and it seemed as if the nation would take new life, under his rule, after three incapable rulers had been killed in a single month." The fact of the three kings is asserted on the strength of Zach. xi. 4-8, where "three shepherds" are mentioned, but it falls at once as destitute of foundation. "Kobolam" is a pure fiction (see Ezeget. on ver. 10). There is no hint in the text of any better principles at the beginning of Menahem's reign; his conduct at Tiphshah rather bears testimony to the contrary. Also all the rest which Ewald brings together in regard to Menahem's reign (Gesch. III. s. 599 sq. [3d Ed. s. 644]) rests upon passages in the prophets Zachariah, Isaiah, and Hosea, which do not contain any history. Winer justly characterizes it as: "a very ill-founded combination."

6. The author does not mention a single event in the reign of Pekahiah. He only speaks of the end of it, which was significant in two respects. Menahem had bought at a heavy price the assistance of Assyria to confirm his royal authority, and to found a dynasty. As long as he lived he maintained himself on the throne. Hardly had his son succeeded him, however, before the vanity of the Assyrian support became apparent. In the second year it was all over with the new dynasty; it was not destined to last. Pekahiah was murdered, not by foreign foes, but by one of his familiar attendants with the help of a portion of the body-guard which should have protected him. Such crimes can be perpetrated only where all the bonds of discipline and order, of fidelity and obedience, are loosed; hence the contemporary prophet Hosea says: "The Lord hath a controversy with the inhabitants of the land," &c. (Hos. iv. 1, 2).

7. In regard to Pekah again, we are not informed of a single act of his. The author tells us, however, that, during his reign, Tiglath-pileser conquered a large portion of the country and carried off the inhabitants. This was the upshot of Pekah's long reign. This was the great event of the time, in comparison with which all else that occurred was insignificant. The reference to this event is meant to show us that with Pekah's reign comes the beginning of the end. The war which Pekah carried on against Judah in alliance with Rezin, contributed to the same general result, as is shown in chap. xvi. It is at any rate a proof of unusual and irrepressible energy that Pekah, in spite of the internal decay and decline of the kingdom, was able to maintain himself so long upon the throne. He had energy and a soldier's courage. The manner in which he attained to the throne shows that he was a violent, ambitious, and perfidious man, who cared not for God or divine things. Isaiah never calls him by his name, but only refers to him contemptuously as the "son of Remaliah" (Isai. vii. 4, 5, 9), probably because he was a man of vulgar origin. We can only guess what passages in the prophets apply especially to Pekah, since we have no historical data in the book before us upon which to attach them. The interpretation of Zach. xi. 16 sq.; xiii. 7; cf. x. 3, as applying to Pekah, which Ewald proposes so confidently (Propheten des A. B. I. s. 319 sq. Geschichte III. s. 602 [3d ed. s. 648]), is arbitrary and forced. Schmieder's opinion (in Von Gerlach's Bibelwerk) that Hosea vii. 4-7 refers to Pekah's conspiracy against Pekahiah, although it is much more probable than Ewald's notion mentioned above, is not by any means above serious doubts.

8. In the history of king Jotham of Judah no details are given aside from the regular data, except that he built the upper gate of the temple (on the north side of the outer court), and that, about the end of his reign, the attacks of Rezin and Pekah upon Judah began. The first of these has direct reference to the statement that the people still sacrificed on the high places, or, as the Chronicler expresses it, that "the people did yet corruptly" (2 Chron. xxvii. 2). In order to put a stop to this "corruption," to which the people was so much accustomed, Jotham "built" the gate, through which the sacrifices were brought in, anew; he desired thereby to induce the people to bring their sacrifices hither and not to the forbidden "high places." This was at least an act inspired by loyalty to the theocracy. This king thereby confessed himself a servant of Jehovah, and the act is therefore especially mentioned. The second fact recorded had, as appears in chap. xvi., more important consequences for Judah than anything else which happened during Jotham's reign. Hence it deserved to be especially mentioned. It was not so much a chastisement for Jotham himself as for the people, who, under the prosperous reigns of Uzziah and Jotham, still continued to act "corruptly," and inclined strongly to idolatry.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL

Vers. 1-7. (Compare 2 Chron. xxvi.) King Uzziah. (a) His prosperous reign of 50 years. (b) His unfortunate end.—It is the greatest blessing for a nation, when a God-fearing king lives long to rule over it. Hence we pray for those in authority.—Ver. 4. How hard it is to abolish and do away with bad customs which have been handed down from generation to generation!—Ver. 5. Uzziah's guilt and punishment. Starke: We should not be over-bold to undertake duties which do not devolve upon us. He who covets more than he has any right to have loses even what he has.—Let each one remain in his own calling to which he is called, and not invade the functions of another calling, even if he has strength and opportunity to do so. We cannot break over the bounds which God has set without incurring punishment.—CALW. BIBEL: This is a warning example for those who behave as if they are capable of being all in all, whereas each one has his own gifts and his own calling. The might of kings does not reach into the sanctuary.—Think no man blessed until thou hast seen his end. The most fortunate, rich, and mighty king learned that "all flesh is grass," and that "the world passeth away," &c., 1 John ii. 17.—PFÄFF. BIBEL: God chastises often the great in this world with heavy misfortunes, in order to remind them of their own nothingness, and to humble them.—Separation from the world and from the current of affairs, and residence in solitude, may become a great blessing to him who recognizes in them a divine dispensation.—CRAMER: Children must take care of their sick and weak and aged parents; must take their places as far as they can, and honor them in word and deed (Sirach iii. 9, 14). [The history of king Uzziah presents warning and instructive lessons especially for a time of prosperity, when greed of gain, love of luxury and ease, respect for wealth, with all the attendant vices of prosperity, are the characteristics of society. See the bracketed addition to Hist. § 1.—W. G. S.]

Vers. 8-31. See Historical and Ethical. The last kings of the northern kingdom, or the monarchy in its decay. (a) The monarchy as the highest civil authority is ordained by God (Prov. viii. 16); it is God's ordinance. If it does not consider itself as such it cannot endure. The last kings of Israel were not chosen and instituted by God, nor even by the people; they raised themselves by force through robbery and murder (Hos. viii. 4). They ruled, not by the grace of God, but by His wrath (Hos. xiii. 11). The monarchy in Israel had lost its foothold on the divine ordinance. All its kings persevered in the sin of Jeroboam, therefore it had no endurance. No dynasty endured beyond the third or fourth generation, some only to the second, the last ones not even to the first; while the house of David, in Judah, did not perish in spite of storms. Where one dynasty overthrows another, there the true, divinely instituted monarchy comes to an end, and people and kingdom perish with it. (b) The monarchy is the "minister of God to them for good" (Rom. xiii. 4); it is its calling to work out the welfare of the people. The last kings of Israel did not care for this, they only cared for power and dominion. Hence the people and the kingdom sank continually lower and lower. When kings only rule for their own sakes and not for the sake of their people, then they cease to be shepherds of their people (Jerem. xxiii. 1-4), and the monarchy decays (Prov. xx. 28; xxv. 5). Rulers who seized power by force and violence, have never been the deliverers and protectors of their people, but rather tyrants, who have led it down to its ruin. "In one demagogue," says Luther, "there are hidden ten tyrants."—As is the master, so is the servant; as is the head, so are the members. A succession of rulers, who attained to the throne by conspiracy, revolt, perjury, and murder, is the surest sign, not only that there is something rotten in the State, but also that there is nothing sound in the nation, from the sole of the foot to the crown of the head (Isai. i. 6; Hos. iv. 1 sq.). The corruption in Israel extended, in the first place, from the head downwards. Jeroboam made Israel to sin. Then, however, it came from below upwards. The rebels and murderers who came to the throne came from the people. These kings were so hostile that the one killed the other but they were of one accord in abandoning Jehovah, and persevering in the sin of Jeroboam. This was the cause of their ruin. When there is no fear of God in the heart, then the door is open to every sin and vice.

Vers. 8-12. The end of the house of Jehu is a clear testimony to the fulfilment of the threats of the divine law (Exod. xx. 5).—Before the people. It is a sign of general demoralization and corruption when sins and crimes can be perpetrated in public without causing horror and incurring condemnation.—Vers. 13-15. As a rule, one successful revolt is only the prelude to another. A throne which is founded on sin, cannot sustain the attacks of storms.—WÜRT. SUMM.: We see in the case of Shallum, the murderer, who reigned but a month, how God, the just judge, exercises His retribution upon tyrants.—Vers. 14-22. In the eyes of a domineering man there is no greater crime than that any one should refuse obedience to his will. Love of command is the vice which makes a man inhuman, and more cruel than a wild animal.—It is the way of all tyrants, great and small, that they are cruel and fierce to those over whom they have authority, but tremble and cringe before any who are greater than themselves.—Menahem, instead of turning to God as his protector and helper (Pa. cxi. 1 and 2), seeks help from the enemies of Israel. He buys this help with money forced from his subjects, but thereby prepares the ruin of his kingdom and people. Cf. Jerem. xvii. 5 and Hos. xiii. 8 seq. A friendship which is bought with money will not last.—Vers. 23-26. A prince who is not faithful to his God cannot expect his servants to be faithful to him, but a king who, like David, is a man after God's own heart, can say: "Mine eyes shall be upon the faithful of the land," &c. (Ps. ci. 6, 7).—OSLANDER: Princes ought not to trust too implicitly to their servants—those whose duty it is to protect them may be the first to strike them.—Vers. 27-31. To the "son of Remaliah" the words apply: "He that exalteth himself shall be abased" (Matt. xxiii. 12).—OSLANDER: Tyrants generally rise very high that they may fall only so much the farther (Isai. xxvi. 4-6).

Vers. 32-38 (cf. 2 Chron. xxvii.).—PFÄFF. BIBEL: How beautiful it is to see children walk in the footsteps of their fathers when these were righteous. It is a glorious thing for a prince, instead of beautifying his palaces, and building ivory houses (Amos iii. 15), to restore the temple gates, and so says to his people: "Enter into his gates with thanksgiving and into his courts with praise" (Pa. c. 4).—Vers. 37 and 38. CALW. BIBEL: We have here a distinct proof that neither the good conduct of a prince by itself, nor the good conduct of the people by itself, can make a nation happy. Prince and people must together serve the Lord, if the land is to prosper.—OSLANDER: When God wishes to punish the sins of a nation, he is wont to remove pious princes by death before the judgment begins.

B.—The Reign of Ahas in Judah.

Chap. xvi. 1-20. (2 Chron. xxviii.)

- 1 In the seventeenth year of Pekah the son of Remaliah, Ahaz the son of 2 Jotham king of Judah began to reign [became king]. Twenty years old was Ahaz when he began to reign, and reigned sixteen years in Jerusalem, and did not that which was right in the sight of the Lord his God, like David his father.
 3 But he walked in the way of the kings of Israel, yea, and made his son to pass through the fire, according to the abominations¹ of the heathen, whom the Lord 4 cast out from before the children of Israel. And he sacrificed and burnt incense in the high places, and on the hills, and under every green tree.
 5 Then Rezin king of Syria, and Pekah son of Remaliah king of Israel, came up to Jerusalem to war: and they besieged Ahaz, but could not overcome him 6 [prevail].² At that time Rezin king of Syria recovered [won] Elath to [for] Syria, and drave the Jews from Elath: and the Syrians³ came to Elath, and 7 dwelt [dwell] there unto this day. So Ahaz sent messengers to Tiglath-pileser king of Assyria, saying, I am thy servant and thy son: come up, and save me out of the hand of the king of Syria, and out of the hand of the king of Israel, 8 which rise up against me. And Ahaz took the silver and gold that was found in the house of the Lord, and in the treasures of the king's house, and sent it for 9 a present to the king of Assyria. And the king of Assyria hearkened unto him:
 for [and] the king of Assyria went up against Damascus, and took it, and carried the people of it captive to Kir, and slew Rezin.
 10 And king Ahaz went to Damascus to meet Tiglath-pileser king of Assyria, and saw an altar that was at Damascus: and king Ahaz sent to Urijah the priest the fashion [pattern] of the altar, and the pattern [plan] of it, according to all 11 the workmanship thereof.⁴ And Urijah the priest built an altar according to all that king Ahaz had sent from Damascus: so Urijah the priest made it against 12 king Ahaz came from Damascus. And when the king was come from Damascus, the king saw the altar: and the king approached to the altar, and offered 13 thereon [went up upon it]. And he burnt his burnt offering and his meat offering, and poured his drink offering, and sprinkled the blood of his peace 14 offerings, upon the altar. And he brought also the brazen altar, which was before the Lord, from the forefront of the house, from between the [new] altar and 15 the house of the Lord, and put it on the north side of the altar. And king Ahaz commanded Urijah the priest, saying, Upon the great altar burn the morning burnt offering, and the evening meat offering, and the king's burnt sacrifice, and his meat offering, with the burnt offering of all the people of the land, and their meat offering, and their drink offerings; and sprinkle upon it all the blood of the burnt offering, and all the blood of the sacrifice: and [as for] the brazen 16 altar shall be for me to inquire by [I will consider further].⁵ Thus did Urijah the priest, according to all that king Ahaz commanded.
 17 And king Ahaz cut off the borders of the bases, and removed the laver from off them; and took down the sea from off the brazen oxen that were under it, 18 and put it upon a pavement [structure] of stones. And [he altered] the covert [covered way]⁶ for the sabbath that they had built in the house, and the king's entry without, turned he from [omit turned he from.—Insert in] the house of the Lord [,] for [fear of] the king of Assyria.
 19 Now the rest of the acts of Ahaz which he did, are they not written in the 20 book of the Chronicles of the kings of Judah? And Ahaz slept with his fathers, and was buried with his fathers in the city of David: and Hezekiah his son reigned in his stead.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 8.—[Abominable rites or usages.

² Vers. 5.—[Q. Isai. vii. 1, where we find עָלֶיהָ after הָיָה, "Was not able to make war against it," & a. successfully.

³ Ver. 6.—[The chetib is to be retained. Q. Ezog. Ewald, Thénias, Böttcher (Lehrb. § 976), and others, who follow the keri, also change לְאֵדֹם, above, to לְאֵדֹמ. The entire conception of the incident is then changed. Rezin does not conquer Elath for himself, but restores it to Edom, in order to strengthen the hereditary enemy of Judah and gain his alliance. Keil very justly objects that אֵדֹמ is written defectively אֵדֹם only once in the O. T. (Ezek. xxv. 14). His explanation of the form אֵדֹמִים is also simpler than the above change. He considers it a Syriac (Aramæic) form (u for a), and points to other similar forms in the same chapter, הַקְּסִיִּים for הַקְּסִיִּים (ver. 7); אֵלֶּיָּהּ for אֵלֶּיָּהּ (ver. 6); רִמְסֵם for רִמְסֵם (ver. 10). Böttcher gives the euphonic and other grounds for these exceptional forms in §§ 1189, 9, 1; 851, a.

⁴ Ver. 10.—[f. a. with full details how it was made.

⁵ Ver. 15.—[I will consider further what shall be done with that." Thénias defends the rendering given in the K. V. He denies that יְהִי־לִי can have the sense which we give it, but he finds it necessary to change לְבָקֶר into לְבָקֶשׁ.

⁶ Ver. 18.—[The keri is supported by the Vulg.: Musæol. However, we find other instances of י' instead of י in the first syllable of a word before ו or ד. See יְהִי־לִי for יְהִי־לִי, Gen. xxiv. 8; יְהִי־לִי for יְהִי־לִי, Ex. xxx. 32. See also Ezek. xli. 8 (Böttcher, § 460, b).—The massorah requires that הַחִיצוֹנָה shall be accented miel, because it will not recognize a feminine in this adjective which agrees with מְבֹרָא. Q. הַגִּלְיָה, chap. xv. 22, Gramm. note.—W. G. S.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 1. Ahaz became king, &c. On the year of Ahaz's accession see the chronological discussion after chap. xvii.—Ver. 2. If Ahaz was 20 years old at his accession and reigned 16 years, so that he was 36 years old when he died, then he must have begotten his son Hezekiah in the tenth year of his age, for Hezekiah, according to xviii. 2, ascended the throne in his 25th year. This would not be an impossibility, for even yet marriages occur in the East between boys of 10 and girls of 8 years (see the instances quoted by Keil in his Comment. on the verse). It is, however, very improbable, and there is no similar instance in Scripture. It is very likely, therefore, that the reading "twenty-five" instead of twenty, which is presented by some MSS., by the Vatican MS. of the Sept., as well as by the Syriac and Arabic translations on 2 Chron. xxviii. 1, is the original and correct one (Ewald, Thénias, and Keil).

Ver. 3. But he walked in the way of the kings of Israel. This cannot mean that he transplanted the Israelitish worship of the calves into Judah, for the relation between Judah and Israel had become hostile even in the last years of his father Jotham (chap. xv. 37). Moreover, there is not a hint of that form of worship in the history of Judah. The words only mean, generally, that Ahaz forsook the covenant of Israel as the Israelitish kings had done. The parallel passage 2 Chron. xxviii. 2 and 3 adds directly the words: "And made also molten images for Baalim. Moreover he burnt incense in the valley of the son of Hinnom." This sentence "is evidently taken from the original authority" (Thénias). Probably it was omitted by the author of the Book of Kings because it seemed to him to be implied in the statement already made that he "walked in the way of the kings of Israel," for these had had images of Baal (1 Kings xvi. 32; 2 Kings iii. 2; x. 26 sq.).

He desired to go on at once to the things which this king had done other than what had been done by the kings of Israel. We have not, therefore, to understand, by the images of Baalim, calf-images like those of Jeroboam (Keil), but idol-images. On the valley of Hinnom see notes on chap. xxiii. 10.—Yea, and made his son to pass through the fire, viz., לְמַלְכָּה. This must be supplied, as we see, from chap. xxiii. 10; Levit. xviii. 21; Jerem. xix. 5. The meaning of the phrase הָעֵצִים בְּאֵשׁ is distinctly stated in Numb. xxxi. 23. It has accordingly been supposed by some that, where בָּרָם or בָּנִים is the object, and not gold or silver, it refers to a literal passage through fire, and that it was an act of lustration or purification (Theodoret, Grotius, Spencer, and others). It is clear, however, from 2 Chron. xxviii. 3, where יְבַעֵר is stands for it, that it is not a simple passage through, but a burning up. The same is clear from chap. xvii. 31; Deut. xii. 31; Jerem. xix. 5; Ezek. xvi. 20 sq.; xxiii. 37. Josephus declares plainly of Ahaz: καὶ ἰδὼν ὀλοκαυτῶσε παιδα (cf. Gesen. Thesaurus, II., p. 985). Another question arises, however, viz., whether we must understand that the children were burned alive, or that they were killed and then burned. The rabbis assert the former (see the passages quoted from Jarchi in Winer's R.-W.-B. II., s. 101), but their authority is overturned by other and better testimony. In Ezek. xvi. 20 it is said: "Thou tookest thy sons and thy daughters, which thou hadst borne to me, and slewest them (הָרַגְתְּם) [as a sacrifice] to them [i. e., to the false gods] לְאֵלֹהִים [i. e., to consume them]. Was thy whoredom too alight a thing that thou slewest (הָרַגְתְּ) my sons, and gavest them away

הַעֲבִיר אֹתָם—[i. e., in that thou causedst them to go through, or, to be burned up in, the fire]? Ps. cvi. 37 sq. speaks only of the slaughter of children in sacrifice to idols, not of burning them: "And they slew their sons and daughters in sacrifice (זִבְחָם) to false gods, and shed innocent blood—blood of their sons and daughters whom they sacrificed (זָבַח) to the idols of Canaan, and the land was desecrated by the shedding of blood (בְּדָמָיִם)." Diodorus Siculus (xx. 12) describes the brazen statue of Kronos (Moloch) with its outstretched arms, glowing hot from an internal fire, but he does not say that the children were laid living upon them. Eusebius (Prep. Evang. iv. 16) states in regard to the human sacrifices which were offered at Salamis that they were first killed by the priest with a spear and then burned upon the pile. Slaying, and cutting in pieces, and shedding blood, are essentials in sacrifice, so that זָבַח, i. e., to slaughter, means, to sacrifice. We have certainly to understand, therefore, in the case of the child-sacrifices, that they were killed before they were burned (Hävernick, Comm. über Ezech. s. 231 sq.). Such seems to have been the case also in the incident mentioned in chap. iii. 27. The only remaining question is this: if the procedure was the same in the case of the child-sacrifices as in the ordinary burnt offerings, why do we find the expression

הַעֲבִיר אֹתָם used only of the former? The probable explanation is that the expression only referred originally to a passage through the fire without consumption, a sort of fire-baptism, as purifications by fire were practised by various peoples, and that it was not connected with human sacrifice. Not until a later time did this become corrupted into a real sacrifice and burning, but the original expression was retained and became general (see Keil on Levit. xviii. 21). It may be, too, as Witsius (Miscell. p. 616) suggests, that the practice was not always and everywhere the same, but both living and dead children were burned, and this expression was used in both cases.

[This is the point in the history of the Israelites at which they became acquainted with the Assyrio-Chaldean idolatry. The gods Baal and Ashtaroth became known to them from the Phœnicians by the marriage of Jezebel with Ahab. That that was the point of contact between the Jehovah-worship and the Baal-worship is proved by the fact that this pair (Baal and Ashtaroth) are the ones whom the Israelites worshipped, and that that was the couplet which was worshipped at Sidon (see note on chap. xvii. 17). Now, however, Pekah and Ahaz came into close intimacy with the Assyrians, and learned from them the astral conception of the same heathen religion. Ashtaroth always had sidereal character, but her worship, so far as it was introduced into Israel, seems to have been confined rather to its voluptuous rites. Ahaz introduced the astral worship into Judah. In order to understand the influence of these heathen religious conceptions on Judah, and the origin of the rite of passing through the fire, it is necessary to take a somewhat comprehensive view of these heathen religious conceptions. Here follows a description of the cultus. On the astral ideas see note on xvii. 17. The religious conceptions of the nations of Western Asia were all closely related to each other. The deity was conceived of as one, simple, formless, and universal, but in a pantheistic sense. It has often been observed that behind the polytheism of these nations (and of Egypt also) there was an idea of one sole and original deity, and it has been inferred that there was a pure and true monotheistic idea at the root, and that the polytheism was only popular. In fact, however, the corruption of these heathen religions was rooted in the pantheistic conception of this original divine essence. Then his attributes were deified (hence the plural Baalim), and not only his good attributes but also his destructive and profane and base attributes. Hence, by a legitimate deduction, all the cruel and licentious rites of pretended religion. In different countries the chief and original God took different names according to the especial point of view from which he was regarded. The Assyrians called him Asshur, or, in a still more pantheistic conception, Ilu; and among the Canaanites he was called El as the "Mighty One," the first and simplest conception of God as strength. He was also very widely named Baal (Babylonian Bel [Merodach]), as the "Lord;" also Yaoth (Hebr. Yahvah [Jehovah]), as the "Eternal," the pure conception of being or existence. The Aramæans named him Haddad or Hadar, "The Only One;" the Ammonites, Moloch, the "King;" the Moabites, Chemosh, the "Governor." Then he received different names according to his attributes, and was worshipped by each nation under the name of the attribute which they kept most in mind. As the deity which presided over generation he was Thammuz or Adon (Hebr. Adonay; Greek, Adonis); as protector and preserver he was Chon; as destroyer he was Moloch; as "presiding over the decomposition of those destroyed beings whence new life was again to spring," he was Zebub (Beelzebub). Hence, probably, Baal-zebub was the god of restoration to health from dangerous sickness. See 2 Kings i. 2. In this last sense probably the main idea was that of resurrection or life from death. The flies on carrion seemed to spring to life out of it. The Egyptian beetle probably embodies the same idea. Moloch was therefore the supreme deity in his attribute of destroyer. Fire, lightning, war, pestilence, and so on, represented him. He was worshipped under this form when his appetite for devouring and destroying was being satiated. Hence his rites consisted in sacrifices of things cast into the fire. Those who robbed themselves of something which they cast into the fire appeased the god and averted the assaults which were to be apprehended from him if his appetite for destruction was not satisfied. The parents who thus sacrificed their children might hope that this frightful sacrifice would save them from further or other losses. When the king of Moab found the fight going against him he offered his son to Chemosh, that the god, appeased by this, might not push on the destruction of war. No doubt he considered that this sacrifice was successful when the horrified Israelites desisted from the war (2 Kings iii.). So far as we can judge, the children were cast alive into the flames.—The religion of Israel differed from these heathen religions in that its supreme deity was personal, spiritual, and holy, and that the Israelites refrained from deifying his attributes as emanations or hypostases of himself.—W. G. S.]

Instead of בָּנִי in ver. 3 and chap. xxi. 6, the Chronicler (II. xxviii. 3 and xxxiii. 6) has the plural בָּנָיו. Thenius regards this as a contradiction, or, at least, as an exaggeration of the passage before us, but the plural stands here, as it often does (Matt. ix. 8; il. 20; Gesen. Lehrgeb. s. 664 sq.), rhetorically, in order to say, in general, that Ahaz and Manasseh had incurred the guilt of child-sacrifice. "The pure, abstract idea of child-sacrifice, apart from any idea of number, is expressed by the plural" (Bertheau, Keil). In like manner, Cicero (De Prov. Cons. xiv. 35): facundissimi liberi, although Cæsar had only a single daughter (cf. also Pro lege Manil. 12). On ver. 4 cf. 1 Kings xiv. 23. The sense is: The centralization of the worship of God, such as the law prescribed, came to an end; the very contrary came to pass. Thenius seizes upon the fact that we have בְּ before בְּמִזְבֵּחַ, instead of עַל, which we find before הַבְּנֵי־עֹזַי, as a support for his interpretation of the former word as "grove" or "sacred enclosure" (see Exeg. on 1 Kings ii. 2 and 3). It stands here, as it often does, for בֵּית הַמִּזְבֵּחַ, Ahaz offered incense in the sacred places on the tops of the mountains and on the hills, i. e., on heights where there was no בֵּית but only an altar.

Ver. 5. Then Rezin, king of Syria. See on this and the following verse: Caspari, Ueber den Syrisch-ephräimischen Krieg unter Jotham und Ahas. Christiania, 1849. After the author has described the reign of Ahaz in its broad and general features (vers. 1-4), the detailed account of the particular incidents begins in ver. 5. אֲזַ only means, therefore, after Ahaz had succeeded to the throne. The attacks began under Jotham (chap. xv. 37), but there had not yet been any formal and united expedition. [The first attempt was frustrated by the attack of Tiglath Pileser on Damascus and Samaria. See Suppl. Note, p. 161.] No real attack was made until Ahaz was on the throne. The object was, according to Isai. vii. 6, to conquer Judah and to set upon the throne a person called "the son of Tabeel," of whom we know nothing further. [Mention of this confederation occurs in the Assyrian inscriptions. We learn there that the name of this "son of Tabeel" was Ashariah.] Whether "they hoped thereby to be able to oppose larger means and stronger force to the aggressions of the Assyrian empire" (Thenius), is a matter for mere supposition. [This supposition is now very strongly confirmed.] They came as far as Jerusalem, which they besieged (צָרָה means besiege, as it does in 2 Sam. xx. 15; Jerem. xxi. 4; xxxix. 1; Ezek. iv. 3, and not merely: "they pressed forward towards it"), but were not able to take it, for the city had been strongly fortified on all sides by Uzziah and Jotham (2 Chron. xxvi. 9; xxvii. 3), and, in the providence of God, it was otherwise decreed (Isai. vii. 7).

Ver. 6. At that time Rezin won Elath for Syria, &c. בְּצֶחַ הַהִיא does not mean "thereupon" or "afterwards," but designates in general the time of the Syriac-ephräimite war against Judah. Ver. 6 is a sort of parenthesis, so that ver. 7 is the real continuation of ver. 5. The author desires to record the danger which threatened Jerusalem, for this was the chief event in this war, and, besides this, to record the fact that Judah, during this reign, lost the city which was its most important seat of commerce, and one of the chief sources of the prosperity of the country (cf. on Elath, notes on 1 Kings ix. 26 and 2 Kings xiv. 22). Ver. 7 then joins on to ver. 5, for Ahas sent to Tiglath Pileser, not on account of the loss of Elath, but on account of his endangered capital, with which the whole kingdom must stand or fall. Many expositors, both ancient and recent, have desired to change לְאַרָם to לְאֶדוֹם, because Elath never belonged to Syria, and therefore could not be "restored" to it. But this conjecture is not supported by a single manuscript or ancient version, and, as Winer and Keil observe, הַיָּם does not necessarily imply the idea of "back again." It means, in general, to turn away from something to something else (Isai. i. 25, and Knobel's note thereon; Ps. lxxxi. 14; Amos i. 8; Dan. xi. 18). It means, therefore, that Rezin took away Elath from Judah, to which it had previously belonged, and joined it to Syria. The case is similar with the word אֲדוֹמִים, for which the keri offers

אֲדוֹמִים, the Sept., Idumæi, and the Vulg., Idumæi, but evidently incorrectly. The Edomites did not need to come to Elath and to settle there; they had always lived in this city, which lay in their own country, and had remained there even when it was in the hands of the Jews. What is asserted, however, is, that Rezin expelled the Jews and brought thither Syrians, who settled there for purposes of trade, and remained there "until this day," i. e., at the time that these books were written the Syrian commercial colony was yet in Elath. Yet one question further suggests itself here, viz., whether Rezin took Elath before or after the attack which he and Pekah made upon Jerusalem. The answer to this question depends upon another one: What is the relation between the record before us and that in the parallel passage in Chronicles? In the latter there is no mention of the expedition against Elath, nor of the siege of Jerusalem. On the other hand, it is recorded that Jehovah gave Ahaz into the hand of the king of Syria, who defeated him, and took away many captives to Damascus; likewise into the hand of the king of Israel, who, in a great battle, won a great victory over him (vers. 5 and 6). This narrative the rationalistic school formerly regarded as an invention and unworthy of belief (Gesenius, De Wette, Gramberg), but that view has been abandoned even by this school. Thenius, amongst others, regards the narrative as unquestionably historical, and as a supplement to the record before us. Nevertheless there is some disagreement as to whether the campaign described in Chronicles is the same one which is described here. Caspari has examined this question very carefully in the work mentioned above; we, therefore, refer in general to that work and here add only what follows. Those, like Vitringa, Movers, Hävernick, and others, who adopt the hypothesis of two successive expeditions, appeal for their proof especially to Isai. vii. 1-9. At the commencement of the war against Judah, when it is made known to the house of David that the Syrians are already in Ephraim, the prophet announces to Ahaz the complete failure of the enterprise of the two kings. As, however, according to the account in Chronicles, Ahaz was defeated by each of these kings, it is inferred that that must have taken place in a different expedition from the one here referred to, and that it took place before the latter; furthermore, that the capture of Elath took place during the second expedition and after the siege of Jerusalem, since it is narrated in the history after that event (ver. 6). It is certain that the two battles mentioned in 2 Chron. xxviii. 5 and 6, must have taken place before the siege of Jerusalem, but it does not follow that they occurred in an earlier expedition. As it was the intention of Rezin and Pekah to put an end to the kingdom of Judah and to put "the son of Tabeel" (probably a Syrian general) upon the throne, it is not by any means to be supposed that they would have abandoned the attempt after gaining two victories over Ahaz, and then would have undertaken a new expedition in order to besiege Jerusalem. On the contrary, it is plain that they would try, after winning two victories, to complete their enterprise by taking Jerusalem. The words in Isai. vii. 2, נָחָה אֲרָם וְעַל-אֶפְרַיִם

do not mean, as they are often translated: "The Aramæans are encamped in Ephraim" (Bunsen), nor: "The Syrians stand [are under arms] in Ephraim" (De Wette), so that it would follow, that Rezin first advanced into Ephraim at the outbreak of the war, in order to advance, in conjunction with Pekah, against Jerusalem. The phrase must be explained as it is in the Chaldee paraphrase: "The king of Syria has joined himself (אֲתָרְבָּר, societatem suam) with (עִם) the king of Israel." So the Sept. translate: συνεπόνορον 'Αράμ

πρὸς τὸν Ἐφραΐμ. "The verb נָחָה with עַל is never used of an army encamping, and it does not seem fitting to take אֲרָם as referring to the country, and אֲרָם as referring to the people" (Hengstenberg). נָחָה means, to lie down to rest, and it expresses, when it is used as it is here of a person who rests upon or over (עַל) another, a being with or by, a being in connection with him (cf. Numb. xi. 25, 26; Isai. xi. 2; Ps. cxxv. 3). [An examination of these passages will show that they do not justify any such rendering of עַל נָחָה as, to be in alliance with. They contain "the spirit rests upon"

or some similar sense of עַל נָחָה, which is a different sense of "rest" and a different sense of "upon" from the one here to be proved. Hengstenberg's objection, that Aram is used of the people and Ephraim of the territory, has force, but the most fair rendering of the words is: "Aram is encamped in Ephraim" (Bunsen, Ewald). נָחָה is not indeed the technical word for the encamping of an army, but it is used for special force. They have settled down, are stationed, are resting and recruiting, but when an army does this it encamps.—W. G. S.] What made Ahaz and his people tremble, as the trees of the forest tremble before the wind, was, not the fact that Syria was in camp in Ephraim, but the fact that the kings of Syria and Israel had joined forces against Judah. The prophet promised that this enterprise should not succeed, and his promise was fulfilled. The supposition that Rezin began the war by taking up a position in the land of Ephraim is, therefore, totally unfounded. Moreover, it was not necessary for him, in order to make war upon Jerusalem, to go through Ephraim. He could just as well advance on the other side of the Jordan, and this he no doubt did. As for the capture of Elath, ver. 6 of the chapter before us does not force us to the assumption that it took place before the siege of Jerusalem, for, as we have said above, ver. 6 is a parenthesis and ver. 7 follows ver. 5. It is also difficult to believe that Rezin gave up the siege, because Jerusalem could not be taken (ver. 5), and then, because he "was unwilling that the expedition should have been made entirely in vain" (The-nius), that he made a long march around the southern end of the Dead Sea in order to return home. After Ahaz had called upon Tiglath Pileser for aid, and the latter was actually advancing against Syria, it is impossible that Rezin can have undertaken this long march; he must have hastened home by the most direct route. In view of all this we come to the following conception of the course of the events. Rezin made an alliance with Pekah and advanced on the east side of the Jordan and won a great victory over Ahaz (2 Chron. xxviii. 5). At the same time, on this side the Jordan, Pekah invaded Judah, and also inflicted a severe defeat on Ahaz (2 Chron. xxviii. 6). As a consequence of his victory Rezin marched on southward to Edom, where he put an end to the hated supremacy of Judah over Edom, and captured Elath, an important source of commercial prosperity to Judah (2 Kings xvi. 6). From thence he moved northwards on this side of the Dead Sea and made a junction with Pekah, who had in the mean time been devastating the country, in order, with him, to make a united attack upon Jerusalem, and so to come to the end of his entire undertaking, namely, to the overthrow of the kingdom of Judah and of the dynasty of David. [It may hardly be worth while to balance conjectures where the basis of testimony on which to build them is so slight. The above construction is open to considerable objection. If a king set out, in alliance with another, against Judah, would it not be strange that he should march through Edom to Elath and then up to Jerusalem before joining his ally? What is more, it is very remarkable that Isaiah, when he prophesies deliverance to Ahaz, makes no reference to two defeats which the king is supposed to have suffered already. We expect a sentence in this form: although thou hast been defeated, yet, &c. The king looks for aid to Assyria. The prophet rebukes this. He evidently expects that the physical form of the deliverance will be something else than Tiglath Pileser's advance. It is more consistent to suppose that the city was found too strong, that the two kings commenced to devastate the country, that Ahaz was twice defeated when he sallied out to try to restrain them, or before he was shut up in the city, and that Rezin pushed forward as far as Elath. Probably it was not until they had made some progress in plundering the country that they heard that Tiglath Pileser was advancing. The information derived from the Assyrian inscriptions strongly sustains this view. Rezin and Pekah revolted in 734-3. Haste was necessary above all things. It was deemed necessary to conquer Judah and force it into the confederated revolt. Hence the news comes suddenly to Ahaz in this startling form: The Syrians are in Ephraim. Before the end of 731 the war was all over and Tiglath Pileser held his court in Damascus. (See Supp. Note at the end of this section.) The whole campaign in Judah was therefore very brief. There was no time for a siege. The two "battles" were fought in the open country, and the "captives" were taken thence, and the long expedition to Elath was undertaken in order to bring the strongest possible pressure to bear on Ahaz to force him to join the revolt, next to the capture of his capital.—W. G. S.] As the Edomites and Philistines had also invaded Judah (2 Chron. xxviii. 17 sq.), Ahaz, pressed on every side, turned to Assyria for help in spite of the warnings and promises of Isaiah (vii. 1 sq.). This induced Rezin to desist from his advance and to hurry home. There he was defeated and slain by Tiglath Pileser.—It is scarcely possible to combine the two narratives in any other than this simple and direct way. Keil also places the capture of Elath before the siege of Jerusalem, but leaves it undecided whether Rezin advanced northwards from Elath, against Jerusalem, or whether, after his victory over Ahaz (2 Chron. xxviii. 5), "he sent a portion of his army into Idumea to detach that country from Judah, while he, in conjunction with Pekah, led the rest of the army against Jerusalem." Against this view arises the objection that ver. 6 makes no mention of a detachment sent into Idumea, but says that Rezin himself marched thither and drove the Jews out of Elath.

Ver. 7. Ahaz sent messengers to Tiglath Pileser. He did not take this step as soon as hostilities commenced, but, as has already been said, when he saw himself hard pressed. He did not heed the prophet's warning and counsel (Isai. vii. 4); on the contrary, by the words: thy servant and thy son, he placed himself in servitude to the king of Assyria as well as under his protection. He sent the presents of gold and silver (ver. 8) after the allied armies had withdrawn from Jerusalem, and Damascus had been taken (ver. 9). Tiglath Pileser took the captured inhabitants of Damascus to K̄r. By this we have not to understand, as the ancient Expositors did, the Median city Κορυμφα or Kapiv, but the country around the river Kur (Κύρος, Κύρρος), which flows through the northern part of Iberia, the modern Georgia, into the Caspian sea (Isai. xxii. 6 [cf. also Amos i. 3-5]). "Tiglath Pileser transferred the inhabitants of Damascus to the most remote portion—in the extreme north—of his dominions, and yet to the place from which their ancestors had originally migrated (Amos ix. 7)." (Thenius). After the subjugation of Syria, Tiglath Pileser advanced against Israel, and accomplished what is recorded in chap. xv. 29. It may be that Pekah submitted at once to the approaching enemy and thereby averted from himself the fate of Rezin. [See Supp. Note, p. 161.]—The statement 2 Chron. xxviii. 20 sq., according to which Tiglath Pileser marched against Ahaz, and besieged him but did not overcome him, is discussed in detail by Caspari (work above cited, ss. 56-60). He strives to reconcile it to the statements of the passage before us, but does not in all respects succeed. So much is certain; Ahaz, in spite of all his gifts to Tiglath Pileser, did not find in him a true helper and friend; on the contrary, he was harshly treated by him: "It did him no good." [The meaning of 2 Chron. xxviii. 20 seems to be more correctly given in the English translation: "He came unto him (not against him), and distressed him (not necessarily besieged him), and strengthened him not."]

Ver. 10. And king Ahaz went to Damascus to meet Tiglath Pileser, i. e., in order to testify to his gratitude towards him for his deliverance, and at the same time to secure the continued favor of the king of Assyria. The latter must, therefore, have remained at Damascus for some time. Perhaps Ahaz himself brought the presents which are mentioned in ver. 8. While he was at Damascus he saw an altar which pleased him so much that he sent orders to Urijah the priest to make one like it. This Urijah can hardly be the same one who is mentioned in Isai. viii. 2. [We should unhesitatingly infer that these two were the same individual, if it were not for the improbability that a man, who would build and introduce into the temple a new altar built on a heathen model, should be called by a prophet a "faithful" witness. The solution may be that the prophet took the priest as a faithful witness on account of his official position solely. The priest, seemed the most fit and proper witness, however much the prophet may have had to find fault with (as to which he tells us nothing one way or the other) in his administration of his office.—W. G. S.] It was undoubtedly an altar consecrated to an Assyrian deity which Ahaz saw, but he desired to have one like it for the service of Jehovah (ver. 15). דָּמָה has a general signification: shape, image; דְּבָרִים designated more particularly the model; and מְעָשָׂה the sort of workmanship, decoration, &c.—In ver. 12, וַיִּזְכֹּר is not to be translated: "and he sacrificed upon it" (Luther, De Wette, and others), but: "and he ascended upon it." See 1 Kings xii. 32, 33. It does not follow from this, however, that "Ahaz was not willing to give up the royal prerogative of exercising the high-priestly office upon occasion" (Thenius). The words mean simply that this was his sacrifice, namely, the one which he offered for his fortunate return from Damascus. He led the way by his own example. We have not to understand that he usurped any priestly functions. It is no more intended to assert in ver. 13 that he himself sprinkled the sacrificial blood, than it is in ver. 14, that he, with his own hand, removed the altar. [The translation: "He went up upon it," is justly preferred by Bähr, but it does not remove the difficulty about the king's share in the sacrifice. Why did he go up upon the altar, if not to perform the rites himself? There is no other evidence at all that any one but the person officiating at the sacrifice went up upon the altar. Furthermore, ver. 13 is not a case of the ultimate agent being said to do what others do by his command. The fact that the king could sacrifice unrebuked by the priest is not any more astonishing than that the priest should make an altar on a heathen pattern, and put it in the place of the one built by Solomon. Both incidents belong to the picture of this reign.—W. G. S.] The thank-offering was the chief thing (ver. 13), but it was preceded by a burnt-offering as usual (Symbol. d. Mos. Kult. II. s. 362, 423, 435). 2 Chron. xxviii. 23 does not contradict the passage before us. It does not refer to the new altar and the sacrifice which was offered upon it, but to the sacrifices which Ahaz offered elsewhere (cf. ver. 4).

Vers. 14 and 15. And he brought also the brazen altar, &c. וַיִּבְרָךְ cannot mean: "he removed," "Er that weg" (Luther), nor: he moved away; "Er rückte hinweg," but: he brought nearer, he moved closer up to. [The sense of "away from" is, of course, in קָרַב. The first meaning of קָרַב is certainly: "he brought nearer," but as it is not clear what it was brought nearer to, the word seems to have lost this force and to mean simply, he moved. Bähr translates: "But the brazen altar (i. e., the altar of burnt-offering), which was before Jehovah (i. e., which was immediately before the house of Jehovah), he moved nearer, away from (the place) before the house (i. e., away from the point) between the (new) altar and the house of Jehovah, and he put it by the side of the new altar towards the north." It is not clear what it was nearer to.—W. G. S.] The altar of burnt-offering was called the "brazen" altar, in contradistinction from the golden altar of incense in the interior of the temple. It stood in the middle of the court of the priests in front of the temple-building. Urijah had placed the new altar in front of this, but Ahaz ordered the brazen altar to be moved away from its former position to the north side of the new one. This he did evidently because the position which was nearer to the dwelling-place of the divinity seemed to be more holy, and he did not wish that the old altar should be regarded as superior in honor or sacredness to the new one. As they were now upon the same line, they were, in so far, equal; while the new one, being in the middle, was, if anything, superior.

In ver. 15 the new altar is called הַזָּבֵחַ הַחָדָשׁ; hardly because "it was somewhat larger than Solomon's altar" (Keil), for the latter was very large, twenty cubits long and wide and ten cubits high (2 Chron. iv. 1). It seems better, with Thenius, "to understand it as in הַזָּבֵחַ הַחָדָשׁ and to translate: 'the chief altar.' " According to Ahaz's orders, all the offerings were now to be made upon the new altar: the regular morning and evening sacrifices, and the special ones of particular individuals, whether the king or others. He did not, therefore, forbid the worship of Jehovah—he did not dare to do that—but nevertheless this worship was to be celebrated only upon an altar imitated from one which belonged to the heathen.—The morning burnt-offering and the evening meat-offering. "It might seem from this that there was no meat-offering in the morning and no burnt-offering in the evening, which would be contradictory to Ex. xxix. 38-42 and Num. xxviii. 3-8. But, as no burnt-offering was brought without a meat-offering (Numb. vii. 87; xv. 2-12), the latter is assumed as a matter of course in the morning offering; and, as the burnt-offering was to burn throughout the whole night (Levit. vi. 9), the meat-offering was the only part of the evening sacrifice at which the people could assist" (Thenius). The final words:

And as for the brazen altar לְבַבֶּקֶר, are translated by the Vulg.: erit paratum ad voluntatem; similarly Philippon: "But to inquire at the brazen altar is my prerogative." This rendering is evidently incorrect, for לְבַבֶּקֶר means to investigate but not to seek out or inquire, much less to be at one's disposition (Levit. xxvii. 33). It has here the same meaning as in Prov. x. 25, to consider, so that the phrase is to be translated: "I will consider [farther]" (Fürst). Thenius, very unnecessarily, desires to read לְבַבֶּקֶר for לְבַבֶּקֶר, because לְבַבֶּקֶר, as he maintains, always means to serve a certain purpose. The meaning would then be "shall be mine for prayer;" i. e., that the old altar should be retained as a "prayer-altar."

לְבַבֶּקֶר is used here, however, as it is in Gen. xv. 12; 1 Sam. iv. 9; Josh. ii. 5. No distinction between prayer-altars and altars of sacrifice was recognized in ancient times. Ahaz did not desire that the altar of Solomon, which had hitherto been held very sacred, should be removed at once, but he desired to wait and see how the people would regard the innovation. He therefore reserved his further commands for a time.

Ver. 17. And king Ahaz cut off, &c. Thenius maintains that this and the following verse are a continuation of the first half of verse 10, and that a more precise statement is here added to the report of Ahaz' journey to Damascus which is there spoken of, viz., that it was impossible for him, after he had obtained the needed assistance, to appear before Tiglath Pileser with empty hands; that the treasury was empty (ver. 8); that he was, therefore, compelled to take for this gift anything which could be made available; and that this is what is meant by the closing words of ver. 18: "for the king of Assyria." But vers. 17 and 18 clearly carry on the narrative of what occurred after the return of the king from Damascus (ver. 12). They are therefore a direct continuation of vers. 10-16. Besides the removal of the brazen altar, Ahaz undertook still further changes in the sanctuary, namely those which are mentioned in vers. 17-18. As the brazen oxen are among the things which he removed, and as they were not carried away from Jerusalem until the Babylonians carried them off (Jerem. lii. 20), it is not to be understood that they were carried as a gift to Damascus by Ahaz. As it was with the oxen, so it must have been also with the other decorations mentioned in ver. 17. Finally the words: "for (מִכְנִי) the king of Assyria," cannot be understood in the sense of: "In the service of the king of Assyria" (Luther), or, "In order to obtain (by abstracting the decorations mentioned) the necessary gifts for the king" (Thenius); for מִכְנִי means for in the sense of from fear of anybody (cf. Judges ix. 21; Gen. vii. 7; Isai. xx. 6; 2 Kings xxii. 19; Hos. xi. 2, &c.), but never for the sake of any one, or out of love to him. Ahaz removed all these valuable objects "before the king of Assyria" not in order to make him a present of them, but either because he thought that they would give him offence or because he feared that he might want them and demand them of him. [This last is the true explanation. He wanted to escape the cupidity of the Assyrians by hiding evidences of wealth.—W. G.

S.]—On the מַזְבֵּחַ of the bases and on כִּיֹּר and the brazen sea, see notes on 1 Kings vii. 27 sq. Ahaz did not set the last "upon the stone pavement" (Luther), but upon a foundation built of stone.—The מִכְנִי was "unquestionably a covered place, a platform or hall, in the forecourt of the temple, set apart for the king when he visited the temple with his retinue on the Sabbaths or feast-days" (Keil). This addition was built later than the rest of the temple. Its form cannot be definitely discovered, for it is only mentioned here. The

Sept. have for it: τὸν θεμελίον τῆς καθέδρας τῶν σαββάτων, which does not throw any light upon it, as they evidently read מִבְּנֵי, foundation, for מִבְּנֵי.

The king's entry without is perhaps the "ascent" mentioned in 1 Kings x. 5. According to Thenius it was "the entrance at the eastern gate of the inner court, which lay towards the outer fore-court through which the king alone entered (Ezek. xlvi. 1, 2), and it is mentioned in contrast to the platform of the king in the inner forecourt, which has just been mentioned." Keil translates הַיָּסָד, which applies to both the localities, "he transferred into the house of Jehovah," but the platform (מִבְּנֵי), which was in the inner court, cannot possibly have been transferred into the temple itself, still less the outer entrance. Moreover, why should this transfer have taken place "before" or "for fear of" the king of Assyria? הַיָּסָד means strictly: to make something turn about, to change a thing so that it is not what it was. Hence it often means to change one's name (2 Kings xxiii. 34; xxiv. 17), and it can only be understood here in the same sense. Thenius: "He 'changed' in the same way as he had changed or altered the bases, &c." This no doubt took place in this way, that he took off from them what was valuable. בְּיָמֵי יְהוֹאָחָז is the ordinary accusative of place, "in the sanctuary."—We see from 2 Kings xxiii. 12 that Ahaz was not contented with the arrangements for worship here made, but also erected altars on the roof of his "upper chamber."—In regard to the sepulture of king Ahaz (ver. 20), 2 Chron. xxviii. 27, says: "They buried him in the city, in Jerusalem, but they brought him not into the sepulchres of the kings of Israel." It is not evident why this is an "error," as Thenius asserts. It does not contradict the record before us, and the same thing occurred in regard to Uzziah, although not for the same reason (cf. chap. xv. 7 and 2 Chron. xxvi. 3).

[SUPPLEMENTARY NOTE on the references to contemporary history in chap. xvi., incorporating the results of Assyrian investigations.—As we saw above (p. 161), chap. xv. gives an account of the intervention of Assyria in the history of Israel. Chap. xvi. gives the history of the intervention of Assyria in Judah. The first revolt of Pekah and Rezin against Assyria, and their conspiracy to attack Judah and force it to join in the attempt, in the last year of Jotham (742), was crushed before it gained any strength. In 734 they once more united in revolt, and renewed their policy of attacking Judah. Ahaz, hard pressed by them (see Exeg. on ver. 7), called to Tiglath Pileser for aid, and paid him tribute. The aid was promptly given, as Tiglath Pileser regarded Rezin and Pekah as rebels. Ahaz was thus relieved from this danger (732). Tiglath Pileser, after dealing with the rebels as described on p. 162, marched into Philistia and took Gaza and Ashdod, and also Dumah in Arabia, and came back to Damascus. It was probably on this march that he "came to" Ahaz, and distressed him; and it was probably at this time that Ahaz removed the furniture of the temple and took away its decorations, lest they might present an appearance of wealth to Tiglath Pileser, and excite his cupidity (see Exeg. on ver. 18). In 731, before leaving Damascus to return to Assyria, Tiglath Pileser "held a court" of his vassals at that city. Twenty-three such vassals came. Among them are mentioned Pekah of Israel and Ahaz of Judah (Lenormant I. 389 and 390). Continued in the Supp. Note after the Exeg. section on chap. xvii.—W. G. S.]

HISTORICAL AND ETHICAL

1. The reign of king Ahaz was the most disastrous through which Judah had yet passed. The kingdom sank so low, both internally and externally, religiously and politically, that it was on the verge of ruin. Such an incapable ruler had never before ascended the throne. The predominant feature in his character was weakness, weakness of spirit and weakness of intellect. History records nothing about him which is worthy of respect. Although Judah and Israel had had many perverse, wicked, and godless rulers, yet these had been at least brave and energetic soldiers; but of Ahaz even this much cannot be said. When the enemy approached "his heart was moved as the trees of the wood are moved with the wind" (Isai. vii. 2). No word of prophetic promise or encouragement could deliver him from his despair. He was defeated; he did not win a single victory; all the conquests of his two predecessors were lost; the land was devastated and robbed of all its sources of revenue. Finally he turns in his distress, in spite of every warning, to the threatening Assyrian power and purchases its help, not only by the treasures of the temple and the palace, but also with the independence and honor of his kingdom. As is usually the case with weak rulers, he cringes before the mighty, but is arrogant and domineering towards his subjects (cf. vers. 7-16). As for the main point, the attitude towards Jehovah, his apostasy was deeper than that of any other king of Judah or even of Israel. He not only tolerated idolatry, but practised it zealously himself, and even went so far in his error as the abomination of sacrificing his own son. The historical books, which only state the facts, do not tell how it came about that a king of Judah, a descendant and successor of David, fell so low, but the prophetic books give us an insight into the religious and moral status of the kingdom. The kingdom of Judah had attained to power and glory under Uzziah and Jotham, as Israel did under Jeroboam II. Flourishing trade and lively intercourse with foreign countries produced wealth, and with it also foreign manners and customs. Finally foreign divinities were introduced. The result was great luxury, effeminacy, debauchery, and excess which soon, especially in the upper classes, led to immorality and vice of every kind. The foreign forms of worship, which were, for the most part, brilliant and attractive, and connected with vice, pleased this degenerate generation better than the simple, severe, and earnest Jehovah worship, which indeed continued, but had degenerated into a mere external ceremonial. Uzziah and Jotham had indeed, as we have said above, done their utmost for the external prosperity of the kingdom. They also remained true to the worship of Jehovah, but they were not filled with warm zeal for it, and they did not oppose effective resistance to the invading corruption. Isaiah, who commenced his prophetic labor in the year in which Uzziah died (Isai. vi. 1), says, in the passage in which, according to the generally received opinion, he is speaking of the time of Jotham: "Therefore thou hast forsaken thy people, the house of Jacob, because they be replenished from the East [filled with Eastern rites and acts] and are soothsayers like the Philistines, and they please themselves in the children of strangers. Their land also is full of silver and gold, neither is there any end of their treasures; their land is also full of horses, neither is there any end of their chariots; their land is also full of idols, they worship the work of their own hands, that which their own fingers have made" (Isai. ii. 6-8). In another passage, which, though it does not belong to the time of Jotham, yet falls in the beginning of the reign of Ahaz, the prophet describes the degeneracy of morals, the debauchery, licentiousness, pride, deceit, alienation from God, injustice, oppression, &c., of the time (Isai. v. 8-25). In such circumstances the youthful Ahaz had grown up. Such was the atmosphere which he had breathed from his childhood up. He was emphatically a child of his time, a faithful representative of the majority of the nation, corrupted by foreign modes of thought and morals. By nature he was weak and vacillating. He allowed himself to be swept away by the stream, and sank deeper into a depraved character and career, so that even the heavy judgments which befell him did not avail to bring him into other courses.

2. *The idolatry which was practised in Judah, in the time of Ahaz, by the side of the worship of Jehovah, was not of the form peculiar to any particular people, but was like that which Solomon allowed his wives to practise (see Exeg. on 1 Kings xi. 5 and Hist. §§ 3 and 4 on 1 Kings xi. 1-13), a mixture of the different kinds of worship which predominated in western Asia. Since, as we saw from Isai. ii. 6-8, such a cultus had been established in Judah even in the time of Jotham, and Ahaz found it in existence when he ascended the throne, it follows that it cannot have been Assyrian in origin, for, in Jotham's time, Judah had not come in contact with Assyria at all. In the book of Chronicles, as well as in the book of Kings, the sacrifice of children is presented as the extreme of apostasy. In its nature this form of sacrifice is the most utter contrast to the worship of Jehovah (see Pt. II., p. 36). As it is not mentioned as having been committed at all before the time of Ahaz, but, on the contrary, he was the first who went so far astray, it has been supposed that he was led to it by becoming acquainted with the Assyrian fire-gods, Adramelech and Anammelech (2 Kings xvii. 31) (cf. Movers, Phöniz. I. s. 65; Winer, R.-W.-B. II. s. 101). The record, however, distinctly contradicts this notion by the words: "According to the abominations of the heathen whom the Lord cast out from before the children of Israel." The Assyrians did not belong to this category and the words apply here, as they do wherever they occur (chap. xvii. 8, 11; cf. Numb. xxxiii. 51-55; Deut. iv. 38), to the Canaanitish nations, that is, the nations of western, not of upper, Asia. It is an unquestioned fact that among the former, especially among the Phœnicians, child-sacrifices were common, and that Moloch, to whom they were offered, was worshipped in western Asia (cf. Levit. xviii. 21, 27 sq.; xx. 1-5). Moreover, it cannot be proved that Ahaz did not perform such sacrifices until after he be-* came acquainted with the Assyrian cultus. It is mentioned in the most general terms as a sign of his apostasy. His sacrificing and offering incense "under every green tree" does not point to Assyrian star-worship, but to the Astarte and Aschere-worship of western Asia. Duncker's notion that Ahaz first offered child-sacrifice when Rezin and Pekah were before Jerusalem, and he was most hardly pressed on all sides ("In vain the king offered sacrifices to the gods of Damascus in order to turn the fortunes of war: in vain he sacrificed his own son as a burnt-offering"), is nothing but a pure construction on the basis of 2 Kings iii. 27. The biblical text does not offer the slightest hint of it. It is in fact very questionable whether child-sacrifices were common among the nations of Upper Asia, and especially among the Assyrians. It cannot, at any rate, be proved from 2 Kings xvii. 31. It cannot, indeed, be denied that Ahaz, after he had met Tiglath Pileser in Damascus, became acquainted with the Assyrian cultus and transplanted at least some parts of it to Jerusalem. This is proved, not so much by the fact that he caused an altar to be built after the pattern of the one which he had seen in Damascus, as rather from 2 Kings xxiii. 12, where "altars upon the upper-chamber of Ahaz" are mentioned, evidently referring to Assyrio-Chaldean star-worship (see note below on the place mentioned). The chariots and horses of the sun which are there mentioned most probably belonged to the time of Manasseh. For the rest, Ahaz tolerated the Jehovah-worship after his return from Damascus; for the sacrifices which he commanded the high-priest Urijah to make (ver. 15) upon the new altar were not offerings to idols but to Jehovah. The weak man had not the courage formally to abolish the Jehovah-worship, for a party which could not be despised still clung to it. He worshipped all possible gods according to his own tastes and notions. In his time there was in Judah complete religious anarchy and license. [See the bracketed note on ver. 3 under Eregetical. That note presents the facts in regard to the point discussed in this section according to the latest and best knowledge. It will be seen that it modifies and corrects some of the above statements.]

3. The war which the confederated kings of Israel and Syria undertook against Judah is "one of the most notable and most important events in the Israelitish history" (Caspari). It was the first time that one of the two sister-kingdoms formed an alliance, with the hereditary enemy against the other, in order to destroy it. This was a most unnatural alliance and was a sign of the process of dissolution which was commencing; for it showed that the consciousness of forming with Judah a common nationality based upon common blood and faith had been lost by Israel. The importance and the external prosperity, which had been won by Judah under Uzziah and Jotham (see above, § 1), had perhaps reawakened Ephraim's ancient, deep-rooted hate and envy of Judah (see 1 Kings xii.; Hist. § 1), and incited the faithless and ambitious Pekah to the alliance with Rezin. In addition to this was the fact that Israel had, under Menahem, fallen into a certain position of dependence upon, and subjection to, the growing and threatening Assyrian power, and that Syria had also, in this power, a dangerous neighbor. In order to recuperate Israel at the expense of Judah, and to find a protection on the side of Assyria in the intervening nation of Syria, Pekah formed an alliance with Rezin, who was also eager for conquest, and these two "fire-brands" (Isai. vii. 4) formed the plan of putting an end to the nation of Judah and the house of David. They made their first efforts in this direction in the last years of Jotham, but without success (chap. xv. 37). When, however, the weak and incapable Ahaz came to the throne, the right time for carrying out their plan seemed to them to have come. But the Lord said: "Take counsel together and it shall come to naught; speak the word and it shall not stand" (Isai. viii. 10). At the moment when they were close to their object they were obliged to give up their plan, and they ran to their own destruction. Rezin lost his kingdom and his life; Pekah was made subject to Tiglath Pileser, and a part of his people were led away into exile (chap. xv. 29). Ahaz also lost his kingdom and his people, and had to bow beneath the supremacy of Assyria. The whole war was a heavy judgment upon the three kingdoms. The kingdom of Syria-Damascus, which had, up to this time, been the instrument of the divine judgments against Israel, disappeared forever from the scene. Israel went on with hasty steps to its destruction, for Pekah was murdered by Hoshea in consequence of his subjection to the Assyrians, and Hoshea, as he refused to pay the tribute to Assyria, was taken captive by Shalmaneser. Thus the kingdom of Israel came to an end (chap. xvii. 3 sq.). [See Supp. Note, p. 161.] "As the hostility to Judah had given it its origin, so the same hostility brought about its destruction: born from this, it also perished by it" (Caspari). Judah itself, finally, as a punishment for its apostasy from Jehovah, came into that contact with Assyria, from this time on, which had such a deep influence upon its history. From this time the conflicts with the small nationalities ceased and those with the great world-monarchies began. In so far this war was, for Judah also, the beginning of the end. It was a turning-point for both nations which had not heeded the chastisements nor the proofs of the goodness and long-suffering of God, but had hardened themselves more and more in their apostasy. "It was in the highest degree providential that the great world-monarchies began to interfere in Israel just at the time when this hardening took place" (Caspari). But this "war between Judah and the allied kingdoms of Ephraim and Syria is still further especially remarkable for this fact, that the grandest prophecies were spoken in it, and that it forms the historical basis of a product of the Old-Testament prophecy which is of the very highest, or, in fact, of unique significance. This fact stands in connection with the position of this war at the turning-point of the Old-Testament history; in the middle of the Israelitish history, at the end of the first and beginning of the second period, in which latter the fortunes of the people of God under the world-monarchy, its period of suffering, falls. It stood, therefore, at the point where a prospect offered itself to the eye of the prophet which reached out over the whole future development of the kingdom of God" (Caspari).

4. After his visit to Damascus, Ahaz caused certain changes to be made in the arrangements of the temple at Jerusalem which were of greater or less significance. The record mentions some of these very briefly, but speaks more at length of those which affected the altar of burnt-offering, because these were by far the most important. Since the entire cultus was concentrated in the sacrifice, and all sacrifices, those of the individual as well as those of the entire people, were to be offered on this one altar (Levit. xvii. 8, 9; Deut. xii. 13, 14), it formed the centre of the sanctuary, which, without it, would have lost its significance. Its form and shape, its position in the sacred edifice, its entire construction, were, therefore, by no means indifferent matters, but they were strictly prescribed in accordance with its character and purpose, so that any alteration of it seemed to be a sort of denial or contradiction of the religious idea which it was constructed to serve. Merely to take away the four horns from its four corners was to desecrate and destroy it (Amos iii. 14; Judith ix. 8. Symbol. d. Mosaisch. Cult. I. s. 473). Now when Ahaz caused this altar to be removed and another made on a pattern obtained from Damascus, this was nothing less than an indirect setting aside of the lawful Jehovah-worship, and it bore witness not only to an entire want of comprehension of that worship, but also to an unheard-of self-will. He ordained, indeed, that the priest should offer all the sacrifices which had hitherto been offered—that is to say, all the sacrifices to Jehovah—upon the new altar. He did not diminish the amount of worship to be paid to Jehovah; the crime and folly were that an idol-altar was used for the worship of Jehovah. It appears that Ahaz intended to gradually transform the Jehovah-worship in this way. Certainly the ground for it was not merely that the form of the altar which he saw "in a city where, according to all the indications which we possess, the fine arts were highly developed, pleased him better than that of the large brazen altar in the forecourt of the temple at Jerusalem" (Ewald), so that "he had rather an æsthetic than a religious reason for the change" (Thenius). For, aside from the fact that there is not an indication of any especial fondness for art in Ahaz, as, for instance, there was in Solomon, and that he was a weak and incapable man, we must notice that he removed even the works of art which were in the temple; he took away the brazen oxen and he destroyed the artistic "bases" upon which the laver rested. He desired that the new altar should be made exactly like the one he had seen at Damascus, and to this end he sent a model of it to Jerusalem. This shows that his object was not so much to have a beautiful work of art as it was to have an altar made on a pattern borrowed from Damascus; his interest in it was not artistic but political. "When he perceived the zeal of the Assyrian rulers for the propagation of their national cultus, he commanded his priests to change the arrangements of the temple so as to conform to this desire" (Duncker). His ordinance in this respect was simply a contemptible captatio benevolentie for the Assyrian king. The removal of the twelve oxen of the brazen sea, which he then placed upon a mere foundation of stone, was, if we consider the significance of this piece of the temple furniture as it is stated above (1 Kings vii., Hist. § 6), a degradation of the Israelitish priesthood and a contradiction of the destiny of Israel as the chosen priest-people, as well as an assault upon the character of the Israelitish religion. The same is true in regard to the removal of the Misgeroth from the bascs, for upon them were the characteristic emblems of the inner sanctuary, cherubim and palms (see above, 1 Kings vii., Hist. § 7). Movers' opinion (Relig. der Phön.), that Ahaz removed the oxen, &c., because the symbolism of animals was especially abominable to the Assyrians, who were addicted to star-worship, seems to us to be entirely erroneous. The changes, finally, which Ahaz made in the gallery and standing-place of the king are not more definitely specified. Possibly there were emblems upon them also which were peculiar to the Jehovah-worship. We hear nothing of any changes in the interior of the sanctuary. Those which were made affected only the objects which stood in the fore-court, so that they were prominently before the eye and might offend the Assyrians. The additional statement in Chronicles (2 Chron. xxviii. 24), that Ahaz closed the doors of the temple, is often brought in question, and asserted to be an exaggeration (Thenius, Bertheau, and others). As it does not stand alone, however, but is supported by the assertion in chap. xxix. 3, that Hezekiah opened the doors again, which again is assumed in vers. 7 and 17, we have as little reason to reject this as any of the other additions to these books which are supplied by the Chronicles. The "upper chambers" with their altars, which, according to 2 Kings xxiii. 12, Ahaz caused to be made, are not mentioned in this place, although they were in existence. We must not forget that Ahaz did not do all at once, but went on from step to step in his apostasy. As it is certain that he did not begin with the sacrifice of his son in the valley of Hinnom, so it is certain also that he did not commence by closing the doors of the temple; on the contrary, these were the extremes to which he allowed himself to be driven under the influence of the heathen party. Fortunately, his reign was not a long one.

5. The conduct of the high-priest, Urijah, under the commands of the king, stands in glaring contrast with that of the high-priest Azariah and the eighty other priests when Uzziah attempted to usurp priestly functions (2 Chron. xxvi. 17 sq.). Instead of resisting the commands of the weak and capricious Ahaz, he keeps silence, bows in acquiescence under his will, "and does all that king Ahaz commanded him" (ver. 16). Neither did the other priests stir; they allowed everything to go on without opposition. We cannot believe that this was the same Urijah whom Isaiah designates as a faithful witness of Jehovah (Isai. viii. 2. 16). [Cf. Ezeget. note on ver. 10.] We should have to suppose that he fell so low after a long interval. Nothing similar had ever been done before by any priest in Judah. It seems that he, like his companions in office, was only anxious for his revenues. At any rate, his conduct is a sign of the character and standing of the priests of that time. They were dumb dogs who could not bark; they all followed their own ways, every one his own gain (Isai. lvi. 10 sq.). Amos, Hosea, Isaiah, and Micah stand over against them, grand and noble, speaking without fear, rebuking the sins both of high and low, and announcing the threatening judgments of God.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Vers. 1-9. King Ahaz. a) The way in which he walked, vers. 1-4. (An apostate from the God of Israel even to the point of offering sacrifices to Moloch.) b) The distress into which he came, vers. 5 and 6. (2 Chron. xxviii. 5. The land was devastated; Elath, the fountain of the national prosperity, was cut off; the throne was in danger. He trembled like the trees of the forest in the wind. Isai. vii. 2.) c) The help which he sought, vers. 7-9. (Instead of seeking help from the living God, to whom the prophet pointed him, he seeks it from the king of Assyria. Ps. cxxiv. 8; Jerem. xvii. 5, 7. Instead of seeking it with prayer and supplication, he seeks it with silver and gold. Pa. i. 15.)—Vers. 1-3. WÜRT. SUMM.: Not all pious parents are blessed with pious children. It is, indeed, a great trial for parents when children do not turn out well, but when the parents have not failed in their discipline, then they can leave the rest to God, and have a good conscience that they have done their best.—Vers. 3 and 4. STARKE: Men are so blind that they think they serve God most truly by those very actions by which they sin most grossly against him.—The Moloch-sacrifice, or child-sacrifice, is a proof of the extravagance of error into which men can fall when they have not the knowledge of the living God and His revealed word, or when they have rejected the same (Rom. i. 21, 22). This abomination, which still continues among heathen nations, is the strongest and most direct call to all, who know the living God and who possess his word, to take part in the work of missions, and to help to bring it about that light may come to those who sit in darkness and the shadow of death, and that they may come to a knowledge of salvation (Luke. i. 79; ii. 32).—God commands us to give our dearest and best to Him, but not to Moloch. There are no longer any sacrifices to Moloch in Christendom, but it happens often enough, even now, that parents sacrifice their children to the idols of the world, which consume them so that they are lost eternally.—PFAFF. BR.: He who trains up his children to evil, sacrifices them to the Moloch of hell, that is, to the devil.—STARKE: As a corrupt atmosphere can taint a healthy body far more easily than a pure atmosphere can purify a tainted one, so also bad companions can lead good people astray more easily than good men can convert bad ones. Evil is more easily propagated than good.—For two hundred years the people in Judah had kept themselves free from idolatry and heathen abominations, and yet Ahaz succeeded in a short time in filling the land with these (Isai. i. 5, 6). The higher a people stands, the lower it may fall. Judah sank even lower than Israel. There have been, and there are even yet, Christian nations which have sunk lower than the heathen. The fall of one who has been most highly blessed is often the heaviest and deepest. Therefore, Be sober! &c., 1 Peter v. 8.—Ver. 4. Happy is he who, under every green tree and on every height, has learned, not to serve the world and its gods, but to praise the one holy, living, and gracious God.—Wherever God has a Church, the devil builds a temple by the side of it.—Vers. 5 and 6. The War of Rezin and Pekah against Judah (see Hist. and Ethical, § 3). The object, the result, and the significance of it (Isai. viii. 10; vii. 6, 7).—The unnatural alliance of the two enemies against Judah. Compare the alliance of Herod and Pilate. Ps. xxxiii. 10 applies.—The allies could not succeed in their enterprise, not on account of a vigorous resistance, but because it was otherwise ordained in the counsels of God. He who says to the turbulent sea: "Hitherto shalt thou come and no further; and here shall thy proud waves be stayed" (Job xxxviii. 11)—He fixes limits and restraints for all human powers, however great and mighty, however victorious and proud they may be.—Ver. 7. CRAMER: He who will not be God's servant must be the servant of men, and must lose all his independence, his honor, and his dignity.—"I am thy servant and thy son, come and help me!"—Address this promise and this prayer in all your need and distress, not, as Ahaz did, to an earthly, human king, however great and mighty he may be, but to the King of all kings, in whom alone is our help (Hos. xiii. 9), for "It is better," &c. (Ps. cxviii. 9; cxlvi. 3, 5).—The friendship and help which is bought with silver and gold has no duration and no value. So it is said of Ahaz here: "He helped him not" (2 Chron. xxviii. 21). The great and mighty, when they listen to the prayer of the humble and the weak for aid, generally have no other object in view than their own advantage, and the increase of their own power.

Vers. 10–18. The Sacrilege upon the House of God. a) The king's self-willed assault upon the established institutions; b) the high-priest's concession. BERLEB. BR.: See in this a clear picture of the lack of Christian spirit in the two highest ranks. The State desires to see everything arranged according to its whims: the Church yields for the sake of the temporal advantage.—It is the fashion of depraved rulers that they think they can command in religious as well as in secular matters, and can control everything according to their own good pleasure.—Those who tremble themselves and cringe before the great are almost always imperious and haughty to those who are below them.—Ahaz' sinful and insane arrangement of sacrificing and offering incense to the Lord upon an idol-altar, is one which may still be observed where the heart is addicted to sin and to love of the world, and is alienated from the living and true God, while yet homage is paid to him.—"Know ye not that ye are the temple of God, and that the spirit of God dwelleth in you?" (1 Cor. iii. 16 sq.; vi. 19 sq.) Whosoever destroyeth the temple of God, him will God destroy. In this temple also there may be only one altar; he who sets up another by the side of it destroys it.—Ver. 16. NEUE WÜRT. SUMM.: There would not be so much harm done by wicked rulers if they did not find so many people who allow themselves to be used as instruments of their evil designs, and who approve of their undertakings in order to win their favor. OSIANDER: Ecclesiastics have always been found who esteemed the favor of great men more than the honor of Almighty God. Would that such men were no longer to be found in the Christendom of to-day!—WÜRT. SUMM.: We have in this high-priest a specimen of those hypocrites and belly-servants who say: "Whose bread I eat, his song I sing;" who veer about with the wind and seek to be pleasant to all men; "dumb dogs who cannot bark;" who wish to hurt no one's feelings, but teach and say just what any one wants to hear. But God's word alone, and not the favor of men, nor the goods and honors of the world, ought to be the rule and norm, from which we ought not to turn aside out of favor to any man, although it may involve risk of life or limb to speak the truth. For if any talk and teach according to the desires of their hearers, for the sake of their own comfort, their honor will come to shame and their end is condemnation (Phil. iii. 19; Acts iv. 19).—Ver. 18. "For fear of the king of Assyria." It is shameful to introduce changes in religious matters for political reasons.

C.—The Fall of the Kingdom of Israel, under Hoshea.

CHAP. xvii. 1–41.

- 1 In the twelfth year of Ahaz king of Judah began [omit began] Hoshea the son of Elah [became king] to reign [omit to reign] in Samaria over Israel
- 2 nine years. And he did that which was evil in the sight of the Lord, but not
- 3 as the kings of Israel that were before him. Against him came up Shalmaneser king of Assyria; and Hoshea became his servant, and gave him presents
- 4 [tribute]. And the king of Assyria found conspiracy in Hoshea: for he had sent messengers to So king of Egypt, and brought no present to the king of Assyria, as he had done year by year: therefore the king of Assyria shut him
- 5 up, and bound him in prison. Then the king of Assyria came up throughout
- 6 all the land, and went up to Samaria, and besieged it three years. In the ninth year¹ of Hoshea the king of Assyria took Samaria, and carried Israel away into Assyria, and placed them in Halah and in [on the] Habor [,] by the river of [omit of] Gozan, and in the cities of the Medes [Media].
- 7 For so it was, that [so it came to pass that when] the children of Israel had sinned against the Lord their God, which had brought them up out of the land of Egypt, from under the hand of Pharaoh king of Egypt, and had feared other

8 gods, And walked in the statutes of the heathen, whom the Lord cast out from before the children of Israel, and [in those] of the kings of Israel, which [statutes] 9 they [i.e., the kings] had made. [—] And the children of Israel did secretly those things that were not right against the Lord their God, and they built them high places in all their cities, from the tower of the watchmen to the fenced 10 city. And they set them up images and groves [statues] in [on] every high 11 hill, and under every green tree: And there they burnt incense in [on] all the high places, as did the heathen whom the Lord carried away [removed] before 12 them; and wrought wicked things to provoke the Lord to anger: For they served idols, whereof the Lord had said unto them, Ye shall not do this thing. 13 Yet the Lord testified* against Israel, and against Judah, by all the prophets,* and by [and by] all the seers, saying, Turn ye from your evil ways, and keep my commandments and my statutes, according to all the law which I commanded your fathers, and which I sent to you by my servants the prophets. 14 Notwithstanding, they would not hear [And they heard not], but hardened their necks, like to the neck of their fathers, that did not believe in the Lord 15 their God. And they rejected his statutes, and his covenant that he made with their fathers, and his testimonies which he testified against them; and they followed vanity, and became vain, and went after the heathen that were round about them, concerning whom the Lord had charged them, that they should not 16 do like them. And they left all the commandments of the Lord their God, and made them molten images, even two calves, and made a grove [an Astarte- 17 statue] and worshipped all the host of heaven, and served Baal. And they caused their sons and their daughters to pass through the fire, and used divinations and enchantments, and sold themselves to do evil in the sight of the Lord, 18 to provoke him to anger. [—] Therefore [It came to pass, I say (ver. 7), that then] the Lord was very angry with Israel, and removed them out of his sight: 19 there was none left but the tribe of Judah only. [() Also Judah kept not the commandments of the Lord their God, but walked in the statutes of Israel 20 which they made. (]) And [then] the Lord rejected all the seed of Israel, and afflicted them, and delivered them into the hand of spoilers, until he had cast 21 them out of his sight. For he rent Israel from the house of David; and they made Jeroboam the son of Nebat king: and Jeroboam drave [seduced]* Israel 22 from following the Lord, and made them sin a great sin. For the children of Israel walked in all the sins of Jeroboam which he did; they departed not from 23 them:* Until the Lord removed Israel out of his sight, as he had said by all his servants the prophets. So was Israel carried away out of their own land to Assyria unto this day. 24 And the king of Assyria brought men from Babylon, and from Cuthah, and from Ava, and from Hamath, and from Sepharvaim, and placed them in the cities of Samaria instead of the children of Israel: and they possessed Samaria, 25 and dwelt in the cities thereof. And so it was [it came to pass] at the beginning of their dwelling there, that they feared not the Lord: therefore the Lord sent lions among them, which slew some of [slaughtered amongst] them. 26 Wherefore they spake to the king of Assyria, saying, The nations which thou hast removed, and placed in the cities of Samaria, know not the manner of the God of the land: therefore he hath sent lions among them, and, behold, they 27 slay them, because they know not the manner of the God of the land. Then the king of Assyria commanded, saying, Carry thither one of the priests whom ye brought from thence; and let them go and dwell there, and let him teach 28 them the manner of the God of the land. Then one of the priests whom they had carried away from Samaria came and dwelt in Beth-el, and taught them 29 how they should fear* the Lord. Howbeit every nation made gods of their own, and put them in the houses of the high places which the Samaritans had made, 30 every nation in their cities wherein they dwelt. And the men of Babylon made Succoth-benoth, and the men of Cuth made Nergal, and the men of Hamath made Ashima, And the Avites made Nibhaz and Tartak, and the Sepharvites burnt 31 their children in fire to Adrammelech and Anammelech, the gods of Sepharvaim.

- 32 So they feared the Lord, and made unto themselves of the lowest of them [from the common people] priests of the high places, which sacrificed for them in the 33 houses of the high places. They [i. e., these immigrants] feared the Lord, and served their own gods, after the manner of the nations whom [whence] they [were] carried away from thence [omitted from thence].
- 34 Unto this day they [i. e., the remnant of the Israelites] do after the former manners: they fear not the Lord, neither do they after their statutes, or after their ordinances, or after the law and commandment which the Lord commanded 35 the children of Jacob, whom he named Israel; With whom the Lord had made a covenant, and charged them, saying, Ye shall not fear other gods, nor bow
 36 yourselves to them, nor serve them, nor sacrifice to them: But [only] the Lord, who brought you up out of the land of Egypt with great power and a stretched out arm, him shall ye fear, and him shall ye worship, and to him shall ye do 37 sacrifice. And the statutes, and the ordinances, and the law, and the commandment, which he wrote for you, ye shall observe to do for evermore; and ye shall 38 not fear other gods. And the covenant that I have made with you ye shall not 39 forget; neither shall ye fear other gods. [;] But [only] the Lord your God ye 40 shall fear; and he shall deliver you out of the hand of all your enemies. Howbeit [and] they did not hearken, but they did after their former manners.
- 41 So these nations [i. e., all the mixed inhabitants of the northern kingdom] feared the Lord, and served their graven images, both their children, and their children's children: as did their fathers, so do they unto this day.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 6. [בשנת החשינית] The stat. const. is used in such cases, where only the second word has the article, in order to form a closer connection between the words. Ex. § 287a. 1.

² Ver. 18.—[On the hifl form וַיִּסֹּר וַיִּעַן, Gen. viii. 18; Gesen. § 72. 7.—W. G. S.]

³ Ver. 18.—The keri נָבִיא for the chetib נְבִיא is in so far correct that the י belongs to the following word, לָל, as a copula, and there is no sufficient reason why נָבִיא should have the possessive pronoun and הוּא not. The keri is followed by the Vulg. and the Syr. and Arab. versions, and is presented by several codices. Maurer and Keil prefer the chetib, but do not offer satisfactory reasons for it.—Bähr. [Ex. § 156 a. note 2, says that, if the chetib is to be kept, then הוּא is a noun=oracle].

⁴ Ver. 21.—[The chetib, וַיִּדָּן, is hifl from דָּן], or, by an interchange of consonants which is frequent in books later than the Pentateuch, דָּוָן. The form does not occur elsewhere from either of those stems. The keri proposes וַיִּדָּן, hifl of דָּוָן. The signification is the same, repeal, remove, or seduce (Dent. xiii. 14; Prov. vii. 21).

⁵ Ver. 22.—[The fem. suff. in כִּסְמוֹתָ refers to the plural הַכִּסְמוֹת. Abstracts are expressed by the plur. or by the fem., and sometimes, where the words are far separated, such an interchange of the one for the other, in relative words, takes place. Cf. Job xxxix. 15; xiv. 19; 2 Kings iii. 8; x. 26. Ex. § 217 a.

⁶ Ver. 23.—[Imperf. in an indirect question referring to something which at a past time was regarded as not to come to pass.—W. G. S.]

THE CHRONOLOGY OF THE PERIOD FROM THE REIGN OF JEHU UNTIL THE FALL OF THE KINGDOM OF ISRAEL.

[Compare the Appendix on the Chronology.]

This period, as well as that from Ahab to Jehu, presents chronological difficulties. Their solution can be successfully accomplished only by starting from the surest possible data, and bringing together and comparing all the separate chronological statements. For the starting-point we have the year 884 in which Jehu, in Israel, and Athaliah, in Judah, came to the throne; the date of the close of the period is also firmly established. The kingdom of Israel came to an end, according to the great majority of the chronologers, in the year 721 B.C. However much they may differ about the limits of the several reigns, they generally agree in this. So Petavius, Usher, Scaliger, Seyffarth, Winer, Tiele, Keil. See Herzog's Encyc.

XVIII. s. 459, where Röscher has collected into a table the results of the investigations of twelve chronologers. [Rawlinson may be added to the number of those who advocate the date 721. On the other hand are Des Vignoles, 718; Bengel, 722; Ewald, 719; Thénius, 722; Bunsen, 709; Niebuhr, 719; and Lepsius still later, 693. It cannot be regarded as a satisfactory scientific procedure to thus borrow the results of a certain number of scholars. There is no such consensus of opinion as would enable us to simply proceed from these dates as results of science which are no longer questioned. In the absence of such a consensus it is mere building upon the sand to make them the foundation of a calculation which makes claim to reliability. It is to gain the appearance of certainty where there is no certainty. In the Appendix on the Chronology will be found a brief criticism of these chronological data and an estimate of their value.—W. G. S.] Bengel and Thénius adopt the date 722, but the difference is not important. They agree with the others in placing Hezekiah's accession in the year 727, and Samaria fell (chap. xviii. 10) during his sixth year, that is, in the year 721. Ewald adopts the year 719 instead of 721. The cause of this difference is that he reckons the years of some of the reigns as complete years, which, as we shall see, is inadmissible. Bunsen differs very widely from the rest. He fixes this date as 709, but his entire calculation is founded upon data of the Assyrian chronology which are, as yet, in the highest degree uncertain, and which have not been yet regarded by anybody as correct. [See the Appendix on the Chronology, §§ 3 and 6.] They cannot, therefore, avail to shake our confidence in the two dates 884 and 721. This period accordingly covers 163 years, and, as the numbers given for the various reigns do not always apply to complete years, but sometimes to fragments of years (see Pt. II., p. 86), inasmuch as the year in which one died and another succeeded may be counted twice over, these 163 years give us the only reliable basis for estimating the length of the separate reigns. If then we calculate, commencing from the year 884, we reach the following results:—

a) For the kings of Judah. Athaliah reigned from 884 on for six years. In the seventh, that is in 877, Joash became king (chap. xi. 3; xii. 2). Since, however, he became king in the seventh year of Jehu, the forty years of his reign were not complete years, so that the accession of his successor falls in 838.—Amaziah reigned 29 years (chap. xiv. 2), that is to 809, or, if the years were not all complete, until 810, or possibly 811.—Uzziah (Azariah) reigned 52 years (chap. xv. 2), that is, until 759 or 758, for all the years of his reign can hardly have been complete twelve-months.—Jotham reigned 16 years (chap. xv. 33), that is, until 743.—Ahaz reigned 16 years (chap. xvi. 2), that is, until 727, in which year Hezekiah came to the throne. In the latter's sixth year (chap. xviii. 10) Samaria fell; that is, in 721. If we add together the numbers representing the durations of these reigns we get 165 years, whereas the time from 884 to 721 is only 163 years. This difference is only apparent. It proceeds from the fact that fragments of years at the beginning or end of reigns are counted as years.

b) For the kings of Israel. Jehu reigned from 884 on for 28 years (chap. x. 36), that is, until 856.—Jehoahaz reigned 17 years (chap. xiii. 1), that is, till 840 or 839.—Jehoash ruled 16 years (chap. xiii. 10), that is, until 823.—Jeroboam II. reigned, according to chap. xiv. 23 only 41 years. But, as he is said in the same verse to have become king in the fifteenth year of Amaziah of Judah, and as this statement is consistent with chap. xiv. 1 and 17, he must have been king, as is shown above (chap. xiv., Exeg. on ver. 23), for 51 or 52 years, unless we are willing to assume that there was an interval of anarchy for 10 or 11 years. At any rate, his son Zachariah did not come to the throne before the year 773. He only ruled six months and his successor Shallum, in the following year, 772, only one month (chap. xv. 8, 13). Menahem reigned from 772 on for 10 years (chap. xv. 17), that is until 762.—Pekahiah reigned two years (chap. xv. 23), that is, until 760.—Pekah ruled only 20 years according to chap. xv. 27; but according to ver. 32 he ascended the throne two years before Jotham of Judah, survived him (he lived 16 years, ver. 33), and waged war with Ahaz, his successor. It was not until the twelfth year of the last-named king that Hoshea became king. Now $2+16+12=30$; therefore, either Pekah reigned 30 years and not 20, or there was no king in Israel for a space of 10 years (see notes on chap. xv. 27). [See the Supp. Note after the Exeg. section on the fifteenth chapter.] This much is certain, that Hoshea became king 30 years after 760, when Pekah ascended the throne, that is, in 730. He reigned 9 years, that is, until 721.—The sum of all the reigns mentioned is 164 instead of 163 years, and this slight difference is accounted for as before in the case of the kings of Judah.

c) The synchronistic data between the reigns in the two kingdoms. Athaliah in Judah and Jehu in Israel began to reign in the same year 884. Joash, Athaliah's successor, became king in the seventh year of Jehu (chap. xii. 2), or, since the latter became king in 884, in 877.—Amaziah became king in the second year of Jehoash (chap. xiv. 1), or, since Jehoash ascended the throne in 840 or 839, in the year 838.—Uzziah became king, according to chap. xv. 1, in the twenty-seventh year of Jeroboam II., but this statement rests, as was shown in the comment on that passage, and as is generally admitted, upon an error of the copyist. We must read, according to chap. xiv. 17, in the fifteenth year, but this was not a full year, so that Josephus says: "In the fourteenth year of Jeroboam." Since now the latter became king in 823, Uzziah ascended the throne in 809.—Jotham became king in the second year of Pekah, chap. xv. 32, or, as the latter became king in 760, in 759.—Ahaz became king in the seventeenth year of Pekah (chap. xvi. 1), or, as the latter began to reign in 760, in 743.—Hezekiah finally became king in the third year of Hoshea (chap. xviii. 1), or, as he ascended the throne in 730, in 727.—In Israel, the successor of Jehu, Jehoahaz, began to reign, according to the correct reading in chap. xiii. 1 (see Exeg. note thereon), in the twenty-first year of Joash, king of Judah, or, as he became king in 877, in 856.—Joash became king in the thirty-seventh year of Jehoash of Judah (chap. xiii. 10), or, as the latter ruled from 877, in 840 or 839.—Jeroboam II. became king in the fifteenth year of Amaziah (chap. xiv. 23), or, as the latter began to reign in 838, in 823.—The accession of the five following kings: Zachariah, Shallum, Menahem, Pekahiah, and Pekah is defined (chap. xv. 8, 13, 17, 23, 27) in terms of the years of Uzziah's reign. Since, however, the year of the accession of this king is less certain than that of almost any other (Bengel and Thénius put it in 811, Usher and Keil in 810, Petavius and Winer in 809, Ewald and Niebuhr in 808), it is uncertain what year was his thirty-eighth, thirty-ninth, fortieth and fifty-second. But this does not render the chronology radically uncertain. The year of accession of these kings can be very satisfactorily ascertained from other data (see above, under b). Moreover, the statements in terms of the years of Uzziah's reign are not perfectly accurate, as we see from chap. xv. 13 and 23. For, if Menahem became king in the thirty-ninth of Uzziah and reigned 10 years, Pekahiah must have followed in the forty-ninth, and not, as ver. 23 states, in the fiftieth of Uzziah. On the other hand, it is certain that Menahem and Pekahiah together reigned for 12 years, viz., from 722 to 760. The year in which Zachariah began to reign (according to ver. 8 the thirty-eighth of Uzziah) may, therefore, have been the year 773; but it is also possible, inasmuch as he and Shallum did not both together reign for a year, that all these kings, Zachariah, Shallum, and Menahem, came to the throne in the same year, 772, and therefore, since the synchronistic data and the chronological data do not coincide, that the thirty-eighth and thirty-ninth of Uzziah both fell in the year 772.—Hoshea, finally, became king in the twelfth year of Ahaz (chap. xvii. 1), or, since he became king in 743, and this was the very beginning of his twelfth year, in 730.

d) From this review it follows that the chronological data in no less than fifteen places, however much they may traverse and interlace one another, nevertheless agree, for the difference of a single year which appears here and there is fully accounted for by the peculiarity of the Jewish mode of reckoning, and it cannot be regarded here, any more than in the former period, as a contradiction. [In making this comment on the chronology, Bähr must take it for granted that the reader has fresh in his mind those changes in the text which have been found necessary, and those assumptions which have been made in order to complete the construction of the chronology. With this modification the above may be allowed to pass as a just comment on what has gone before. Otherwise it would convey a very incorrect impression of the reliability of this chronology.—W. G. S.]

Now, on the other hand, there remains one datum which is utterly irreconcilable with these which have been considered. According to chap. xv. 30 Hoshea became king in the twentieth year of Jotham, son of Uzziah. This stands in contradiction to three other statements which are consistent with each other. According to chap. xv. 33 Jotham did not reign for 20 but only for 16 years, as is also stated in 2 Chron. xxvii. 1. According to chap. xvii. 1, Hoshea did not become king until the twelfth year of Ahaz the successor of Jotham. According to chap. xvi. 1, Ahaz commenced to reign in the seventeenth year of Pekah, and as Ahaz waged war with Pekah (chap. xvi. 5), it is impossible that Pekah's successor, Hoshea, should have begun to reign during the reign of the predecessor of Ahaz, Jotham. All sorts of attempts have been made to solve this flat contradiction (see Winer, R.-W.-B. 1, s. 414). We take notice here only of the two most common ones. The first is to this effect: Jotham was coregent with his father Uzziah for four years, during his sickness (chap. xv. 5). If these four years are added to the sixteen of his reign, he was king for 20 years, and Hoshea became king in his twentieth. This attempt at a solution is disposed of, not to speak of other objections, by the statement in xvii. 1, that Hoshea did not become king until the twelfth year of Jotham's successor, Ahaz. The second attempt at a solution, the one which was adopted by Usher, and which has been lately designated by Keil as the only successful one, assumes that, in chap. xv. 30, 4 years of the reign of Ahaz are reckoned in the reign of Jotham, "because the history of Jotham's reign is not narrated until we come to ver. 32 sq." But the years of the reign of a king cannot possibly be reckoned on after his death, least of all when, as here, his successor followed immediately; moreover, as above stated, Hoshea did not become king in the fourth of Ahaz (or, if so reckoned, the twentieth of Jotham) but in the twelfth of Ahaz. All attempts at a reconciliation are here vain. Hitzig and Thenius have attempted to escape the difficulty by text-conjectures, but these are so complicated that they do not fall, in point of improbability, at all behind the artificial attempts at reconciliation. When we examine the final words of chap. xv. 30: "In the twentieth year of Jotham the son of Uzziah," they strike us as strange and unusual. In other cases we do not find the date of a king's accession given in terms of the corresponding reign in the sister-kingdom until we come to the place where the history of the new reign begins (see the proof-passages quoted above, Pt. II., p. 89). Such is the case here also with reference to Hoshea, chap. xvii. 1. The author, who, in the usual place, viz., where the history of Jotham's reign begins, chap. xv. 33, states the duration of that reign at 16 years, in agreement with 2 Chron. xxvii. 1, cannot possibly have spoken, a few lines before, in ver. 30, of the twentieth year of Jotham. If he had, he must have been more forgetful than the most thoughtless copyist. In fact these words are, in this place, not only superfluous, because the statement of the year in which Hoshea became king is given farther on in its proper place (chap. xvii. 1), but they are even a cause of confusion. If they should be adopted as correct, it would be necessary to change a whole series of data to correspond with them. All this renders it very probable that the words are a false and late addition, in regard to which the case stands as it does with 2 Kings i. 17 (see Pt. II., pp. 87-8). Another circumstance which goes to prove this is that Jotham's father is called, in vers. 1, 6, 7, 8, 13, 17, 23, 27, Azariah; here all at once he is called Uzziah. Keil unjustly characterizes the erasure of this clause as "violent," for we are compelled to it, since fifteen other passages, all of which are consistent with one another, are in irreconcilable conflict with this one, so that it introduces contradiction and confusion into the entire chronology of the period. The question is simply whether we will correct all the other data to bring them into consistency with this one, or whether we will sacrifice it. If it is not "violent" to change the number "27," in chap. xv. 1, into 15, as Keil does, then it is not violent to regard the number 20, in chap. xv. 30, as incorrect.

e) In this period, as well as in the former one, some have thought it necessary to assume joint-reigns and interregna, that is, times of anarchy in which there was no king. So it is supposed that the two Israelitish kings Jehoahaz and Jehoash reigned together for 2 or 3 years, and the Jewish kings Jotham and Ahaz for 4 years. We have spoken above (Pt. II., p. 88) about the theory of joint-reigns in general, but besides this, the first of these cases is disposed of when we have discovered the correct reading in chap. xiii. 1 and 10 (see Exeg. notes thereon); and the second, when we have removed the false addition chap. xv. 30, upon which alone it rests. The assumed interregna have much more probability in their favor. Formerly it was often assumed that there was an interregnum of 11 years between Amaziah and Uzziah in Judah, but this is now almost entirely abandoned, and rightly. On the other hand, two others are still assumed in the history of Israel by almost all scholars, the first of 11 years, between Jeroboam II. and Zachariah; the second of 9 or 10 years, between Pekah and Hoshea, to which reference was made above under b). But the biblical text does not hint at any such interregna, though they must have been of great importance for the history of the kingdom. On the contrary, it always assumes that each king was followed immediately upon his death by his successor. The author makes especial mention of the fact about Edom that "there was no king in Edom" (1 Kings xxii. 48), and he mentions a king who reigned but 7 days (1 Kings xvi. 15), and another who reigned but a month (2 Kings xv. 13). Certainly he would not have passed in silence over the fact that Israel, at two different times, for periods of 9 or 11 years, was without a king. It is true, as Kell says, that "A period of anarchy in a time of the utmost confusion and distraction would not be anything astonishing," but it certainly would be astonishing that the text should be silent about such an important historical event. There are no historical statements whatsoever in the text which have led to the hypothesis of interregna. This hypothesis is the result solely of the desire to reconcile certain chronological data. We cannot, however, be induced to manufacture history to account for certain discrepancies in figures, discrepancies which can arise so easily from simple errors either of a copyist or of others. Josephus is as silent about any periods in which there were no kings as the Bible is. Ewald calls the hypothesis that there were such periods "erroneous in every respect. It contradicts the tenor of the text directly, and produces an utterly incorrect conception of the history." Bunsen also rejects the hypothesis decidedly. Wolff, in the work quoted above (Pt. II., p. 89) says: "We must, therefore, have done entirely with this notion of interregna as an escape from difficulties. It invents arbitrarily blank and empty periods and inserts them in the history." When, however, Wolff changes most of the chronological data of the text,—when he gives Jehoahaz 14 instead of 17 years, and Jehoash 19 instead of 16, when he makes Amaziah succeed in the fourth instead of the second year of Jehoash, Zachariah in the twenty-sixth instead of in the thirty-eighth year of Uzziah, Pekahiah in the thirty-eighth instead of in the fiftieth year of Uzziah, Pekah in the forty-first instead of in the fifty-second of Uzziah, and asserts that the two Israelitish kings Jehoash and Jeroboam II. ruled over Judah, the former for 4 years and the latter for 27 years, that is all as void of foundation and as arbitrary as is the "interregnum-hypothesis" which he rejects.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 2. And he did that which was evil  but not as the kings of Israel, i. e., not to the same degree as his predecessors. As the formula: "He did that which was evil, &c.," always refers to the attitude towards Jehovah and the Jehovah-cultus, so the restriction: "But not," &c., must be understood as applying to the same, just as in chap. iii. 2. We are not told wherein Hoshea differed from his predecessors in this respect. It is not at all probable that he desisted from the calf-worship (Thenius). If he had done so he would have broken down the wall of separation between the two kingdoms, and the text would certainly have contained some mention of it. The old commentators for the most part follow the statement of the rabbis in the book, Seder Olam, chap. xxii., according to which Hoshea did not replace the golden calf-image at Bethel (Hos. x. 6), which had been carried away by the Assyrians, and made no opposition to his subjects' accepting Hezekiah's invitation to the passover-festival at Jerusalem (2 Chron. xxx. 6-11). But, according to the account in Chronicles, this invitation was laughed at and scorned; only "a few" accepted it, which shows that Jeroboam's cultus was still maintained under Hoshea. Moreover, Hezekiah's passover certainly did not take place before the three-year siege of Samaria, but rather after it. Perhaps Hoshea's better behavior was limited to this, that he was an opponent of the idolatry which had found entrance under his immediate predecessors.

Ver. 3. Against him came up Shalmaneser, king of Assyria. This king must have ruled between Tiglath Pileser (xv. 29) and Sennacherib (xviii. 13) in Assyria. It has hitherto been believed that Sargana, who is mentioned in Isai. xx. 1, ruled for a short time between these two, but, "through the deciphering of the cuneiform inscriptions it is placed beyond a doubt that the king of Assyria who is called in the biblical annals Shalmaneser or Shalman [Hos. x. 14], really bore the name of Sargana, so that he is identical with Sargon, who was the father and immediate predecessor of Sennacherib" (Wolff, in the above quoted work, s. 672. Cf. Brandis, Ueber den historischen Gewinn aus der Entzifferung der assyrischen Inschriften, ss. 48 and 53). [Later discoveries show that this statement is incorrect. Sargon and Shalmaneser are different persons, and not even of the same dynasty. See the Supp. Note at the end of this section, in which this whole subject is treated.] Among the countries mentioned in the inscriptions as having been conquered by Sargana is "Samirina" (Samaria). (See notes on chap. xviii. 13 below.) Hoshea does not seem to have provoked Shalmaneser's first expedition against him (ver. 3). It appears to have been an expedition of conquest on the part of the growing and spreading Assyrian power, yet it is also possible that Tiglath Pileser had imposed a tribute upon Pekah which Hoshea refused to continue to pay, and that the expedition was intended to compel him to do so. When he, however, at a later time, again refused the tribute (ver. 4), and had recourse to Egypt for help to resist, the king of Assyria came a second time and took away from him his country and his people. As Shalmaneser waged war with Tyre, but Island Tyre resisted him for five years (Josephus; Antiq. 9, 14, 2), Ewald supposes, and very many of the latest authorities follow him, that the people of Samaria joyfully recognized in this a proof that the Assyrians were not invincible, and considered this a favorable opportunity to make an offensive and defensive alliance with Egypt; furthermore, that when Shalmaneser heard of this, he suddenly marched against Hoshea. It is impossible, however, to determine certainly whether the war against Island-Tyre took place before or after the fall of Samaria. Knobel, in fact, in his comment on Isai. xx. 1, assumes that it took place after that event. Thenius unnecessarily desires to change קִשָּׁר, conspiracy, to קִשָּׁר, falsehood, deceit. We have to understand by "conspiracy" nothing more than a secret agreement. The name of the Egyptian king מֶנְסֵה is to be punctuated מֶנְסֵה, Seveh. In Manetho he is called Ζευεχός. He is doubtless "one of the two kings named Shebek of the twenty-fifth dynasty, belonging to the Ethiopic race" (Keil). Hoshea turned to him because Egypt was at that time the only great power which seemed at all able to cope with Assyria. It seems, however, that Seveh did not enter into the alliance, or, if he did, that he did not carry it out when the Assyrian attack was made. On the words: The king of Assyria shut him up, &c., Vatablus remarks: Hoc dicitur per anticipationem; postea narratur, quomodo factum. The final consequences which Hoshea's attempted revolt had for his own person are stated forthwith, and then in vers. 5 and 6 the particular description of the course of events in regard to the country and the people is given (Thenius). It is not, therefore, correct that "Shalmaneser ordered him to appear and give an account of his conduct" before the siege of Samaria, "and then, when he came in obedience to this command, made him prisoner" (Ewald, Schlier). The text does not say this; on the contrary, the words in ver. 6 and in chap. xviii. 10: "In the ninth year of Hoshea," assume that Hoshea was king when the city was taken. Moreover, it is very improbable that Hoshea, who had sought for, and was expecting, aid from Egypt, would have forthwith obeyed the summons of the king of Assyria, from which he could not anticipate any pleasant consequences, and that, after the king of Samaria had been made captive, that city should have resisted for three years. On the contrary, the captive king was taken in chains to Assyria after the city had been taken, and there he was put in prison, while his people were led into exile in distant regions. "Plate 100 in Botta's Monum. de Ninev. represents a king standing upon a war chariot, before whom a chained captive with apparently Hebrew features is being led. Plate 106 represents two figures with the same cast of countenance and appropriate costume, one of whom is presenting the model of a fortified city" (Thenius). יָצָר is used here as in Jer. xxxiii. 1; xxxvi. 5.—The three years of the siege were not thirty-six months, for, according to chap. xviii. 9 sq. it began in the seventh of Hoshea, and the city was taken in his ninth. Accordingly it can hardly have lasted for two years and a half. [The later discoveries have so changed the face of our knowledge of all this contemporaneous history that the above must all be modified by what is stated in the Supp. Note below.]

Ver. 6. And carried Israel away into Assyria, &c., into the kingdom of Assyria, which then included Mesopotamia, Media, Elam, and Babylon (Winer, R.-W.-B. I. s. 102). It is, therefore, a general designation of place which is followed by the names of the particular localities in this kingdom. The two first names, in Halah and on the Habor, belong together, as well as the two latter, On the river Gozan and in the cities of Media, as is evident from 1 Chron. v. 26: "And brought them unto Halah, and [to the] Habor, and [to] Hara [i. e., Media] and to the river

Gozan." This verse also shows that הָבֹר is not, as has often been supposed, in apposition to בְּחָבֹר: "To the Habor, the river of Gozan," so that Habor would be the name of this river. There is nothing else with which the name Halah can be identified but the district in the north of Assyria bordering upon Armenia, which Strabo (xi. 8, 4 and xvi. 1, 1) calls Καλαχία, and Ptolemy (vi. 1) Καλακινί. [Lenormant takes it to mean Calah, the capital of Assyria at this time.] Habor is not הָבֹר (Ezek. i. 1 and 3) in upper Mesopotamia, the large river which flows into the Euphrates, but, because the name Halah precedes, it must be "the smaller river of this name which flows westward and empties into the Tigris to the north of Nineveh" (Ewald). Here, in northern Assyria, there is a river, which is called Khabur Chasania to distinguish it from the river Chaboras or Chebor in Mesopotamia. It still bears its ancient name" (Keil). The Jewish tradition also favors this. This designates northern Assyria, and, in fact, the mountainous region, the district on the border between Assyria and Media, on the side towards Armenia, as the place of exile of the ten tribes (cf. Wickelhaus; Das Exil der zehn Stämme Israels, in the Deutsch-morgenländ. Zeitschrift; V. s. 474). The river Gozan is "the Kisel-osen, which rises in the northern part of the Zagros range and flows into the Caspian Sea" (Fürst, Dictionary s. v.). It refers, therefore, not to the district of Mesopotamia which Ptolemy calls (v. 18) Γαζανίτις, but to the city of Media which he mentions (vi. 2) as Γαζανία. This we see also from the passage in Chronicles quoted above, where "the river Gozan" is mentioned after Hara, Media. "If this river, which bounds Media, is the one meant, we can understand why the 'and' is, in this connection, omitted before it. The two first names and the two latter names then belong more closely in pairs" (Ewald). Thenius desires to change הָבֹר into הָבֵר, and הָבֵר into הָבֵר, because the Sept.

here read: ἐν Ἐλαδ καὶ ἐν Ἀβύρ ποταμοῖς Γαζάν καὶ ἐν ὄρεσις Μήδων, so that Halah also would have to be taken as the name of a river, that is, of the one anciently called Mygdonius and afterwards Saokaras. But the Sept. have, in the similar verse, chap. xviii. 11, the singular ποταμῷ. The plural ποταμοῖς is, therefore, evidently a mistake. This disposes of the rash supposition that Halah is the Saokaras. The proposed reading הָבֵר is, to say the least, unnecessary.

Ver. 7. And it came to pass when the children of Israel, &c. The frequently recurring כִּי יָדָה means always: "And it came to pass when" (Gen. vi. 1; xxvi. 8; xxvii. 1; Exod. i. 21; Judges vi. 7, &c.). It is not correct, therefore, to translate as Bunsen, De Wette, and others do: "And it came to pass, because." Ver. 7 does not carry on the narrative as it is taken from the original authorities, but the writer himself here begins a review of the history and fate of Israel, which ends with ver. 23 and forms an independent section by itself. The conclusion to the opening sentence: "And it came to pass, when," &c., follows in ver. 18: "That then the Lord was very angry." Vers. 8-15 contain merely a development of what is said in ver. 7, inasmuch as they go on to specify how, and by what means, the children of Israel "sinned," viz., partly by apostatizing from Jehovah and falling into idolatry (Ex. xx. 2, 3), and partly by making for themselves molten calf-images to represent Jehovah (Ex. xx. 4). It is shown in the verses from 18 to 23 that these transgressions brought down judgments upon them, and what was the character of these judgments.—The words in ver. 7: Which had brought them up out of the land of Egypt  king of Egypt must not be taken as a parenthesis, as Luther takes them. They do not contain a mere incidental remark; rather the entire emphasis rests upon them, as is evident from Hos. xii. 10 and xiii. 4-6. The deliverance from Egypt was really the selection of Israel to be God's peculiar and covenant people (Ex. xix. 4-6). It was not only the beginning, but also the symbol, of all divine grace towards Israel, the pledge of its divine guidance. It therefore stands at the head of the covenant, or organic law (Ex. xx. 2; Deut. v. 6), and it is always cited as the chief and fundamental act of the divine favor (Levit. xi. 45; Joshua xiv. 17; 1 Kings viii. 51; Ps. lxxxi. 10; Jer. ii. 6, &c.). Therefore this author also makes that the standpoint for his review and criticism of the history. He means to say, thereby: although no people on earth had experienced such favor from Almighty God as Israel had, nevertheless it abandoned this God and adored other gods. Vers. 8-12 state the manner in which this latter fault was committed. The worship of idols was the worship practised by the very people whom God expelled before the Israelites, and whose utter destruction he commanded, that is to say, of the nations of Western Asia (ver. 8, cf. Deut. xi. 23; 1 Kings xiv. 24; xxi. 26; 2 Kings xvi. 3; xxi. 2). But the Israelites erected places of worship all over the country, after the fashion of the heathen, instead of worshipping the one true God in the one central sanctuary (vers. 9-11). They also followed the example of the heathen in setting up idol images which they worshipped (ver. 12).—חָפְצֵי, ver. 8, means religious ordinances (see notes on 1 Kings ii. 3; iii. 3). Instead of holding faithfully to the ordinances which Jehovah had given, the kings of Israel gave to the people ordinances made by themselves, which were obeyed and observed by them. The result is given in ver. 9. The words יִחַפְּצוּ are translated by Keil, who follows Hengstenberg: "They covered Jehovah, their God, over with words which were not right, i. e. they sought, by arbitrary distortions of God's word, to conceal the true character of Jehovah." It is clear however, from חָפְצֵי in ver. 11, and, still more certainly, from חָפְצֵי, ver. 12, where it cannot possibly be understood otherwise than as thing; that that is its sense here, and not word. The fundamental signification of חָפַץ or חָפְצָה is to cover, cloak over, envelop (2 Sam. xv. 30; Esth. vi. 12; 2 Chron. iii. 5, 7, 9). The literal rendering of these words would therefore be: "They covered Jehovah with things which were not right" (2 Kings vii. 9), i. e. They concealed him by them, so that he could no longer be seen and recognized, which is as much as to say that they practically denied and ignored him. Compare the formula כָּפַר עָלָיו, to reconcile any one with Jehovah; primarily, to cover up his sins before Jehovah.

The things by means of which, or with which, they denied Jehovah are mentioned forthwith, so that Luther correctly represents the sense when he puts nämlich before the following words. The translation of the Sept. is entirely incorrect; καὶ ἡμίσαντο λόγους ἀδίκους κατὰ κυρίου θεοῦ αὐτῶν. Thenius follows this, and explains thus: "They dressed up, decorated, and adorned things which were not right, against Jehovah; i. e. they made a parade of things which were not right against Him," and he calls attention, in this connection, to "the parade and pomp of the external forms of idolatry." It is equally incorrect to render the words as the Vulg. does: et offenderunt verbis non rectis dominum suum; or, as Gesenius does: perfidie egerunt res in Jehovah; or, as De Wette does: "They wrought secretly things which were not right, against Jehovah." With words of covering

עֲלֵי is never against, but always over, or upon (Ex. xxxvii. 9; xl. 3; Ezek. xxiv. 7).—[The uncertainty attaching to the interpretation of these words is apparent from these diverse renderings of the various expositors. Bähr's interpretation, which is closely akin to that of Keil and Hengstenberg, is fanciful and far-fetched. The idea of men covering God, that is, obscuring the sense of His presence, and of their responsibility to Him, by their sins, and thus practically denying Him, is, in a religious sense, most true and just; but it is very foreign to the simplicity of the conceptions which we find in the Old Testament, especially in the historical books. The meaning of עֲלֵי חָפְצֵי is, to cover a material over an object, or, in the English idiom, to cover an object with a material. If the notion be not pushed farther than this, that they had put their evil lusts and deeds between themselves and God, and preferred these to Him, it offers a meaning which is satisfactory, and which agrees well with the latter half of the verse. I have, however, allowed the E. V., which agrees substantially with the rendering of Gesenius and De Wette, to remain unaltered.—W. G. S.]

Ver. 9. From the tower of the watchmen, &c., i. e., from the lonely buildings erected as a protection for the flocks (2 Chron. xxvi. 10) to the largest and most strongly fortified cities.—On ver. 10 see chap. xvi. 4. On מִצְבּוֹת see notes on chap.

iii. 2. On אֲשֶׁרִים see note on 1 Kings xiv. 15. On the meaning of כָּעַם see 1 Kings xiv. 1-20; Hist. §

3.—In ver. 12, the emphasis is on הַגִּלְלִים, which contains a subordinate contemptuous and abusive signification (see note on 1 Kings xv. 12). Israel sank so low that it worshipped lifeless idols, which it ought to have treated with contempt, and whose worship it ought to have disdained.

Ver. 13. The author now goes on in his review to the consideration of that which Jehovah had done in his faithfulness and truth, in contrast to the apostasy of the people, which has just been described. These dealings of God with His people had remained fruitless, or had produced exactly contrary results from those which were desired (vers. 13-17). Not only in Israel, of which kingdom he has hitherto been speaking especially, but also in Judah, which, according to ver. 19, had behaved in a similar manner, had Jehovah be so witness to himself, not only by the law and testimony which had been given, but also by his prophets and seers. Quacunq; ratione vel forma illis cernendam proponebat voluntatem suam (Piscator). The form of speech in ver. 14, to harden one's neck, i. e. to be stiff-necked or obstinate, is borrowed from Deut. x. 16. Cf. Exod. xxxii. 9. To disobedience and obstinacy (ver. 14) they added formal rejection and contempt of the commands and of the testimonies of Jehovah (ver. 15), and then followed complete decline into heathenism. This last is described by the words: They followed vanity and became vain. The same form of speech is used in Jerem. ii. 5, and St. Paul makes use, in reference to the heathen, in Rom. i. 21, of the same expression which the Sept. here use to render this: ἐπαυλοῦνται. Heathenism deals with nothingness, vanity, that is, with what has no existence, so that it is folly and falsehood (Deut. xxxii. 21). As a proof that they have fallen into heathenism, that is, have become vain, a series of facts is detailed in vers. 16 and 17, from which this appears clearly. In the first place they made calf-images, then Ascherre, then they adored the host of heaven (the stars or constellations), and finally they caused their children even to go through the fire (see note on chap. xvi. 3), and devoted themselves to soothsaying and augury. Besides all this, they sold themselves, that is, "they surrendered themselves into complete slavery to idolatrous practices" (Thenius). All the host of heaven is here mentioned between the worship of the Ascherre and that of Moloch; that is, by the side of the Moon-goddess and the Sun-god, cf. Deut. xvii. 3; iv. 19. Perhaps the planets are to be especially understood by it. As the author has here only that period in view which fell before the Assyrian influence commenced, we cannot understand him to refer to the Assyrio-Chaldean worship of the constellations, which is not met with among the Hebrews before the time of Manasseh (chap. xxi. 3; xxiii. 5, 11), but only to that which was common in Western Asia, such as we find especially among the Arabs (Winer, R.-W.-B., II. s. 528). Soothsaying and augury are mentioned with the same expressions in Numb. xxiii. 23 and in Deut. xviii. 10, by the side of the worship of Moloch. They seem to have been especially connected with this worship (Winer, l. c., s. 672).

[As has been abundantly shown in the translator's notes on the two last chapters (see especially note on xvi. 3), the Assyrian religion became known to the Israelites in the time of Ahaz and Pekah. The subdivisions of the deity (if they may be so called), which these heathen believed in, have been described in that note. But, by the side of each such subordinate or local god, we find a goddess, as the passive principle by the side of the active. These couplets had different names in different places (Bel and Belit at Babylon; Shed and Shedath among the Hittites (שֵׁד, Gen. xvii.

1; Job v. 17; Ruth i. 20, &c.); Haddad and Atargath at Damascus). The couplet which the Israelites adopted, Baal and Ashtaroth, is that of Sidon, showing whence this religious idea came to them. On the Baal-worship and the rites of Moloch see note on xvi. 3. The astral idea in this heathen religion does not seem to have attracted the attention of the Israelites before the time of Pekah and Ahaz, although Ashtaroth always had, a distinctly sidereal character among the Phœnicians. The whole religious conception which has been above described, and which prevailed in Western Asia, was carried out by the Chaldeans and Assyrians into an astral system of deities. When the hierarchy of divinities, or deified emanations and attributes, with their corresponding masculine and feminine forms, had been elaborated, they were identified with the luminaries visible in the heavens. The sun, moon, planets, constellations, and stars formed a corresponding hierarchy whose members were identified. Eight cabirim or planets were reckoned; one was supposed to be invisible because it was nearer to the ultimate and original source, the ALL. It is not difficult to perceive the step by which they passed from this to astrology, divination, and sorcery. If the heavenly bodies are gods, or represent gods, and if they are seen to be in motion, then it is natural to suppose that those motions correspond with and cause the mutations of earthly events and fortune. Since the time of Ahaz and Pekah these religious notions had been introduced into Israel and Judah and accepted there. It is to them that the text refers.—W. G. S.]

Ver. 18. That then the Lord was very angry, &c. Here begins the real conclusion to ver. 7 [see the amended translation]. As we had, in vers. 8-17, the more complete development of ver. 7, so we have here, in vers. 19-23, that of ver. 18. Out of his sight, i. e. out of the Holy Land where Jehovah has His dwelling; out of the land of the covenant and the land of revelation. Cf. Ezek. xi. 15 sq. On the tribe of Judah only, see 1 Kings xi. 13, 31, 36 (Ezcg. notes).—In ver. 19 the old expositors thought they saw the statement of a still farther reason for the rejection of Israel by God, which consisted in this, that it had, by its apostasy, tainted Judah also (Hos. iv. 15), but the context shows that this notion is false. The verse is rather a parenthesis, as the Berleberg. Bibel observes. It contains an incidental remark which is brought out by the "only" in ver. 18. It means to say that "in truth Judah was also ripe for punishment" (Thenius). Ver. 20 follows directly upon ver. 18 in the connection of thought. We must understand by all the seed of Israel, not the entire people, Israel and Judah (Keil), but only the ten tribes; for the rejection of Judah had not yet occurred. The inhabitants of certain districts had been taken into exile, during the reign of Pekah (chap. xv. 29). The inhabitants of the entire country were now, under Hoshea, taken away. Before that Jehovah had given them, for their chastisement and warning, into the hands of plunderers or "spollers," first into the hands of the Syrians (chap. x. 32; xiii. 3), and then into those of the Assyrians (chap. xv. 19, 29).—וְכָּ, in ver. 21, connects back, not only with ver. 18, but also with what has been said in vers. 18-20. Grotius says justly in regard to ver. 21: ἐνένοχος ad ostendendam maiorum originem. Jeroboam's calf-worship, which led to pure idolatry, was a consequence of the revolt from the house of David and the separation from Judah, so that these were the cause of all the misfortune. The Vulg. therefore renders, according to the sense: Etc. eo jam tempore quo sciens est Israel a domo David. It cannot be correct to take Jehovah as the subject of וְכָּ, as the old expositors did, and as Keil still does.

This is a deduction from 1 Kings xi. 11 and 31, but the final cause of the apostasy and rejection of Israel is here given, and that cannot lie in Jehovah himself. The separation from the House of David took place indeed according to God's decree; but it was only intended to serve as a humiliation to the House of David, and was not to last "forever" (1 Kings xi. 39). It took for granted, moreover, that Jeroboam would remain faithful to the covenant and to the Law of Jehovah (1 Kings xi. 38). But Jeroboam broke with these in order to make the separation permanent. The separation thereby became the germ of all calamity for Israel.

The natural subject of קרע is אֶת־יְהוָה (see 1 Kings xii. 16), and it is not necessary to read, as Thenius does, נִקְרַע, i. e. "Israel had torn itself away;" nor to supply, as De Wette does, אֶת־יְהוָה: "Israel had torn away the royal authority from the House of David," for it is not the monarchy as such which is here in question, but the separation between Israel and Judah, that is, the disruption of the theocratic relation. The words mean simply: secessionem fecerant (Clericus).—Ver. 22 is not a mere repetition of ver. 21, but it means: Israel not only fell into this sin of Jeroboam, but it persevered in it in spite of all the divine warnings and chastisements.—Ver. 23. As he had said by all His servants the prophets. Cf. for instance, Hos. i. 6; ix. 16; Amos iii. 11, 12; v. 27; Isai. xxviii. 3. Unto this day, i. e. until the time at which the author was writing, which does not mean to affirm that the exile did not last any longer.

Ver. 24. And the king of Assyria brought. This king the old expositors supposed to be Esarhaddon (chap. xix. 37), because (Ezra iv. 2) the Samaritans who desired to take part in the erection of the second temple, say to Zerubbabel: "We do sacrifice unto him [your God] since the days of Esarhaddon, king of Assur, which brought us up hither." Keil still maintains this, because he thinks that ver. 25 shows "that considerable time must have elapsed between the leading of the Israelites into exile and the introduction of new colonists into the depopulated country." But this does not by any means follow from the words: It came to pass at the beginning of their dwelling there. The context forbids us to think of any other king than the one above mentioned, Shalmaneser. Esarhaddon was not even his immediate successor, for [Sargon and] Sennacherib intervened. He did not come to the throne until 695 [681] B.C., that is, twenty-six years after the Israelites were led into exile by Shalmaneser in 721. Nothing is more improbable than that the latter should have left the country destitute of population, and that this state of things should have lasted for twenty-six years. The colonists who speak in Ezra iv. 2 are [descendants of] later ones, whom Esarhaddon may have sent, for some reason unknown to us, to join those already there. Why does not the author mention by name the king who is spoken of in chap. xix. 37, if that is the one he here meant? [This point also is treated in the Note below, at the end of Exeg. section.] Babel is here not the city, but the province, as in Ps. cxxxvii. 1. The position of Cuthah is entirely uncertain. Josephus says: τὸ Χουδαῖον ἐστὶν, ὃ πρότερον ἐνδοτέρῳ τῆς Περσίδος καὶ τῆς Μεδίας ἦσαν. According to Gesenius and Eesenmüller, Babylonian Irak must be thought of as lying somewhere in the region of Nahar Malka. Clericus considers the Cuthaeans as identical with the Kosseans, in Susiana, in the northeast of what is now Khurdistan, and this opinion is the best founded (cf. Winer, R.-W.-B. L. s. 237). As the Samaritans are called by the rabbis simply כּוּתִיִּים, it seems probable that the Cuthaeans composed the main body of the colonists. [Cuthah was close to Babylon,—a suburb of it. See the Supp. Note below.] The location of the city or district Ava is also uncertain. It has been sought in Persia, in Syria, and in Mesopotamia. Perhaps it is to be identified with the Ivah which is mentioned in chap. xviii. 34; xix. 13; Isai. xxxvii. 13. [Ivah, however, is unknown. In ver. 31 it is said that "the Avites made Nibhaz," a Chaldean god. Hence this place was unquestionably in Chaldea, near the others except Hamath. Whoever caused this migration had just conquered Chaldea. See the Supplementary Note below.] Hamath (1 Kings viii. 65; 2 Kings xiv. 25), in the north of Palestine, on the Orontes, had then already fallen under Assyrian dominion. Sepharvaim is generally believed to be the Σαφράρα mentioned by Ptolemy (v. 18, 7), the southernmost city of Mesopotamia, on the eastern bank of the Euphrates. However, as it is mentioned in Isai. xxxvi. 19, together with Hamath and Arpad, Syrian localities, we might be rather led, with Vitrings and Ewald, to the supposition that it was a Syrian city. [It is undoubtedly Sippara, called by the Greeks Heliopolis. (Its divinity was Shamash, the sun, שֶׁמֶשׁ). The Chaldean legend of the flood says that Xisuthrus, warned by the gods of the approach of the flood, buried at Sippara tables on which were written an account of the origin of the world and of the ordinances of religion. His children dug them up after the flood, and they became authorities for the Chaldean religion (Lenormant). The primitive Chaldeans were Turanians; but if the word has a Semitic etymology it would seem to mean the Scripture-city (סֵפֶר).—W. G. S.] (On these different names, see Winer, R.-W.-B. s. v., [and the Dictionaries of the Bible]. This is the first time that שֶׁמֶרֶךְ is used of the entire kingdom. It is incorrect to infer, as Hengstenberg does, from the words: Instead of the children of Israel, that all the inhabitants, to the last man, were taken into exile, for, see 2 Chron. xxxiv. 9. [Samaria was now reduced from the tributary to the provincial position, as Damascus had been twelve years before.]

Ver. 25. And it came to pass at the beginning of their dwelling there, &c. The land became desolate in consequence of the exile of its inhabitants, especially as some time, no doubt, elapsed before the new colonists arrived and brought the land once more under cultivation. It is also probable that their number was not nearly as great as that of the exiles. So it came to pass that the lions, which had been in the country in small numbers before the exile, multiplied to such a degree as to be dangerous to the new inhabitants. Under the circumstances this was not purely a natural incident, but a divine dispensation. The author so considers it, having in mind

Levit. xxvi. 22 (Exod. xxxiii. 29; Deut. xxxii. 24; cf. Ezek. xiv. 15). The colonists saw in this an interposition of the god of the country, because they had not worshipped him. In order to escape from the plague they sent a request (ver. 26) to the king who had located them in this country, that he would send some one to them who could teach them how to worship the local deity, so that he might release them from the calamity. [See, on the heathen conception of local deities, Pt. II. p. 57.] With a genuine heathen judgment they considered the external worship a means of appeasing the god of whom they knew nothing. The priest who was sent to them was, as ver. 27 expressly states, one of the exiles—that is to say, one of the priests of Jeroboam's calf-worship. He took up his residence at Bethel, the chief seat of the calf-worship (1 Kings xii. 29), although the Assyrians had carried away the golden calf (Hos. x. 5). Perhaps they erected there new images, not molten images, but less artistic and less expensive ones. The sending of this priest seems to be so particularly narrated, because it shows how it came that the country did not become entirely heathen.

Ver. 29. Every nation made gods of their own. The new inhabitants, who had been brought from very different countries, set up, in the houses on the high places, which the Samaritans had prepared as places of worship (see Exeg. on 1 Kings iii., 2 and 3), the images of their gods. Selden (De Diis Syr. ii. 7) understands בָּנוּת בָּנוֹת in the literal meaning of the words: "Daughter-huts," and most of the expositors since his time have followed him in this interpretation. It is then understood to refer to the huts or tents in which the young women prostituted themselves in honor of Mylitta, i. e. Venus, a custom which Herodotus speaks of, I. 199. However, this is clearly against the context, for, whereas ver. 29 treats of the places of worship, ver. 30 gives the names of the gods whose images were set up in them. Succoth-Benoth is the first-mentioned amongst these. It is not, therefore, an appellative any more than the following names: Nergal, Asima, Nibhaz, and Tartak. The old versions all give it as a proper name. The Sept. have ἡνὲ Σωκχὺς Βανὺς or Βανὺς. They therefore understood by it a female divinity. "בָּנוֹת" (Amos v. 26) was the name of a female divinity, and בָּנוֹת בָּנוֹת appears only to contain a modification of it. Neither word is to be referred to a Hebrew etymology" (Fürst). We must not, therefore, understand it as referring to "little temples or shrines which were worshipped, together with the image which they contained" (Gesenius), but to the image of a particular divinity of which we know nothing further. The rabbis assert that it was a hen with her chickens, representing the constellation of the "Clucking Hen" [the Pleiades]. This is possible, but no further proofs of it can be produced. Movers' interpretation of it, as female genitals, is entirely without foundation. The passage 2 Kings xxiii. 7, which is often referred to for the above-mentioned ordinary interpretation, has no pertinency here.

[For an exhaustive summary of the different interpretations of these words heretofore offered, see Herzog's Encyc. XV. s. 253. The Babylonian goddess Bilit or Mylitta (see note on ver. 17) took two forms, just as Venus did in the classical mythology. The one, Taautu, was austere, the other, Nana or Zarpanit, was voluptuous. She had a temple at Babylon, where every woman was forced, once in her life-time, to surrender to a stranger as an act of worship to the goddess. At Cutha she was worshipped as Succoth-benoth, a name referring to these prostitutions. In the astral system she is Ishkar. In her "austere" form she is sanguinary and is the "Goddess of Battles—the Queen of Victories;" in her voluptuous form she presides over reproduction. Moreover two Ishkars are distinguished, each of which presides over two weeks of the month (hence called the "Goddess fifteen"). This accounts for the Phoenician plural form Ashtaroth. (Lenormant.)]

The names Nergal, Asima, Nibhaz, and Tartak have hitherto been explained very diversely upon etymological grounds, some of which are fictitious, and all of which are very uncertain. (See Gesenius' Thesaurus; Winer's R.-W.-B. s. v.) We therefore pass over these attempts at explanation. The rabbis ascribe to Nergal (probably Mars) the form of a cock, which certainly does occur frequently on the old Assyrian monuments; to Asima, the form of a goat; to Nibhaz, that of a dog; to Tartak, that of an ass. But these statements also rest upon very uncertain etymologies. The case is not much better with the names Adrammelech and Anammelech. We can only infer from the child-sacrifices which were offered to these idols so much as this, "that they were akin to Moloch" (Keil). The interpretations of Movers and Hitzig are very uncertain and doubtful.

[In an inscription of Nebuchadnezzar, now in the British Museum, is read: "I consecrated the portico of the god Nergal and of the god Nibhaz, the gods of the temple Valpiltam at Cutha." (See note on ver. 24.) "The special god of this town was Nergal, and we learn from some mythological details given in the tablets of the library of Ashurbanipal, that he was worshipped there under the form of a lion." (Lenormant, I., 485.) His image is rare. He stands on the legs of a cock and has a sword in his hand. His epithets are: "the Great Hero, the King of Fight, the Master of Battles, Champion of the Gods." Hence he is identified with Mars.—Adrammelech=Adar-Malik, i. e. "Adar the king." Adar (fire) was also called Samdan (the powerful). He was the Assyrian Hercules. Anammelech=Anu-Malik, i. e. "Anu," or "Oannes, the king." "Oannes, the 'Lord of the Lower World, the Lord of Darkness,' was represented on the monuments under the strange figure of a man with an eagle's tail, and for his head-dress an enormous fish, whose open mouth rises above his head, while the body covers his shoulders." (Lenormant.)]

According to ver. 32, the worship of heathen gods and the worship of Jehovah, under the form of the calf, existed side by side. In regard to the priests "from the mass of the people" see note on 1 Kings xii. 31.—Ver. 33 repeats and brings together the contents of vers. 28-32.

Ver. 34. Unto this day they do after the former manners. Even at the time at which the author was writing they still followed the way of the first colonists, that is, those which are described in vers. 28-33. Some did not worship Jehovah, but served idols (vers. 25 and 29); these were the heathen who had immigrated, who had brought their national divinities with them and still worshipped them; the others worshipped Jehovah indeed (vers. 28-32), but not according to the ordinances which had been given them by Him; these were those of the Israelites who remained, and those who adopted the worship taught by the priests of Jeroboam's calf-worship, who were sent back for the purpose (ver. 27). The words in ver. 34: After their statutes or after their ordinances, do not, therefore, stand "in contrast" with those which immediately follow, as Keil thinks, that is, with the words: After the law and commandment which the Lord commanded the children of Jacob, so that the meaning would be: "Until this day the Samaritans have retained their peculiar worship, which consists of idolatry and the worship of Jehovah through the calf-image, and do not worship according to the manner of the ten tribes, nor according to the Mosaic law." The וְאַחֲרֵי before בְּחֻקֵּי cannot have any other meaning than that which it has before the preceding and the following words. It does not, therefore, mean "still," but "and" in the sense of "namely," in which sense it so often occurs. The words " $\text{וְאַחֲרֵי בְּחֻקֵּי}$ " form an epexegetis to " בְּחֻקֵּי ," as Thénien justly remarks cf. 1 Kings ii. 3.—The sentence: Whom he named Israel has the same sense here as in 1 Kings xviii. 31.—In reference to those who at the time of the author still persisted in illegal worship, or even in idolatry, he points expressly, in order to show the heinousness of their offence, in vers. 35-39, to what Jehovah had done amongst His people and for them, and how earnestly he had warned them against any breach of the covenant.—On ver. 36 see note above on ver. 7. The breach of the covenant was the more base inasmuch as the Lord had miraculously removed all the hindrances, even the greatest ones, and had held faithful to His people. In ver. 37 particular stress is laid upon the fact that the Law was written, and not merely spoken. The existence of the written law is, therefore, assumed as undoubted.—And they did not hearken (ver. 40); i. e. "Those descendants of the ones to whom this warning and exhortation had been addressed, who had remained in the land" (Thénien). Their former manner, i. e. the worship introduced by Jeroboam. Ver. 41 brings the author's review of the history to a close with a reference to the posterity of the apostates who had not desisted from the sins of their fathers. [There is great obscurity in the verses 33-41, probably because the writer has in mind different classes of the Samaritan population whom he does not distinguish or define. Thus the subject changes in vers. 33 and 34 without being specified in such a manner as the laws of grammar require. If we paragraph as is done in the amended translation, and identify the subjects as is there suggested, we reach a clear meaning.—The new population of the northern kingdom might be classified thus: (a) Sincere worshippers of Jehovah in the old theocratic sense. These were very few, if indeed there were any. (b) Worshippers of Jehovah under the form of the calf, i. e., adherents of the old worship of the northern tribes. (c) Israelites who adhered to the calf-worship, but had adopted also the idolatry of the heathen colonists. (d) Heathen colonists who had adopted the calf-worship.—Thus there were very few, possibly none, whom this theocratic author could approve. The third and fourth were the largest classes, and are the ones referred to in the text. Those under (c) "feared not the Lord," i. e. in the religious sense. They knew him and should have been his servants, but were not, while they apostatized to idolatry. Those under (d) "feared the Lord," not in the religious sense,—they never had been taught to fear God in that sense,—but they were afraid of Him, and paid Him deference, but served, i. e., gave their faith and worship to their heathen divinities.—W. G. S.]

[SUPPLEMENTARY NOTE on the references to contemporary history in chap. xvii. (See similar notes after chaps. xv. and xvi.) The great king Tiglath Pileser died in 727. In the same year Ahaz died and was succeeded by Hezekiah on the throne of Judah. Shalmaneser (IV. Rawlinson; VI. Lenormant), the next king of Assyria, seems to have been a less able ruler. We have no records of him save some bronze weights in the British Museum. The dates, however, are furnished by the canon. Hoshea's revolt against Pekah, as we saw at the end of the note on chap. xv., was a success for the policy of submission to Assyria. However, this entire history is nothing but a series of revolts against Assyria, and Hoshea, in his turn, soon renewed the attempt. In 725 the Ethiopians, who had for some time held dominion over Upper Egypt, invaded Lower Egypt under a king named Shebek (Sabacon, Shabaka). This name is really Shaba or Shava, with the Cushite article ka appended. It is therefore written in Hebrew סִבַּק . The Massorettes punctuated this סִבַּק . (See note on ver. 4 above.) This king succeeded in overrunning all of Egypt, and conquering it, although the native dynasty preserved its succession, being confined to the western half of the delta "in the marshes" (Herod. II. 137). The appearance of this great conqueror on the scene infused hope into the small nations of Western Asia that they might be able at least to change masters; that this new Egyptian power might form a counterpoise to the Assyrian; and that his rule might be found milder. Hoshea was seduced by this hope. He plotted a revolt, but Shalmaneser hastened to crush the attempt before union with Shebek might make it formidable. He captured Hoshea, conquered the province of Samaria, and in December, 724, laid siege to the capital by investment. In 722 he died. He left a son who was a minor. The Tartan or general-in-chief, Sargon, a member of the royal family, seized the throne in spite of some opposition. An eclipse of March 19, 721, was influential in some way at this crisis. For three years he was nominally regent for the young prince (Samdan-Malik = Samdan [Hercules] is King). From 718 on he reigned alone. He was a great conqueror, one of the most famous of the kings of Assyria. He regained all the territory which had been lost and extended the empire beyond any limits which it had ever attained. "The long inscriptions found by M. Botta in the palace of Khorsabad make us even better acquainted with the details of his reign than with those of more than one of the Roman emperors." A long inscription, called commonly the "Acts of Sargon," details the events of fifteen campaigns. The following are the contents, so far as they are interesting to us in the present connection:

"I besieged, took, and occupied the city of Samaria, and carried into captivity 27,280 of its inhabitants. I changed the former government of the country, and placed over it lieutenants of my own." Thus he counts the capture of Samaria among his own achievements. In place of the inhabitants whom he forced to emigrate, he introduced colonies from Elam which he had just conquered.

" and Sebeh, Sultan [so Lenormant translates a rare title which is said to mean suzerain, referring probably to Shebek's position as a recent conqueror and not regular king] of Egypt, came to Raphia to fight against me; they met me and I routed them. Sebeh fled."

Pursuing the record in order to find traces of the recolonization of Samaria, we notice the following:

From 720 to 715 the Assyrians were occupied in an unsuccessful siege of Tyre. "Yaubid of Hamath persuaded Damascus and Samaria to revolt against me, and prepared for battle. I killed the chiefs of the rebels in each city and destroyed the cities." [This revolt of Samaria, after its reduction to a province, is not mentioned in the Bible. It may have been after this conquest of Hamath that some of the inhabitants of that country were colonized in Samaria.]

The inhabitants of Papha in Pisidia were transported to Damascus.

In 710 he marched against Ashdod, which had revolted (Isai. xx. 1).

In 709, according to the canon of Ptolemy, Sargon defeated Merodach Baladan at the battle of Dur Yakin. By this victory he resubjugated Chaldea, which had been independent since 747. The prisoners taken in Chaldea were colonized in Samaria. In August, 704, Sargon was assassinated.

He was succeeded by Sennacherib, whose glory rivalled that of his predecessor. In regard to him see the Note after the Ezra section on the next chapter. In 681 he was assassinated by his two sons.

Another son, Esarhaddon, succeeded him, and reigned from 681 to 667. On him also see below. We are only concerned here with one statement in his annals.—At the close of his first campaign, which was in Phœnicia, he says: "I settled the inhabitants of Syria and the sea shore in strange lands. I built in Syria a fortress, called Dur-ashur-akhiddin, and there established men whom my bow had subdued in the mountains, and towards the sea of the rising sun (Caspian)." [Whether Syria here includes Samaria is indeed doubtful, but it is probable that, as the policy of transportation was practised more and more, it became more thorough and comprehensive. Probably this was a large migration, since the name of a country is given for the new seat of the colonists instead of the names of cities. Hence the memory of this migration was perpetuated while the lesser migrations under Sargon were forgotten. It is not at all likely that the different migrations remained distinct from one another, and remembered each the time and occasion of its own migration. The second temple was finished in 516 (Ewald), so that from the time of Esarhaddon to the time of the speakers in Ezra iv. 2 there must have been 160 years. This is sufficient to account for the fact that they ascribe their origin to Esarhaddon.] In this account we have followed Lenormant's Manual very closely.—W. G. S.]

HISTORICAL AND ETHICAL.

1. Only so much is narrated in regard to the nine years' reign of Hoshea as pertains to this fact, that he was the last king of the kingdom of the ten tribes. "Hoshea's chief aim was to become independent of Assyria. He saw what a mistake Menahem had made when he called Pul into the country, and what had been the sad consequences to Pekah, who had subjected himself to Tiglath Pileser" (Schlier). [See the last paragraph of the Supplementary Note on chap. xv.] He therefore refused the tribute which had been imposed, turned to Egypt for help, and defended himself for three years bravely and perseveringly against the Assyrian power. From this it is evident that he was not a weak ruler, but that he had a strong will and was an able general. But the despairing resistance was useless; the measure was full, the days of the northern kingdom were numbered, and the long threatened ruin drew on unchecked. The criticism upon Hoshea's reign, and his conduct in general, which is given in ver. 2, is often understood as if it asserted that he was the best of all the kings of the northern kingdom. Ewald says: "It seems like a harsh jest of fate that this Hoshea, who was to be the last king, was better than all his predecessors. The words of the noble prophets who, during the last fifty years, had spoken so many and such grand oracles in regard to this kingdom, had perhaps had more influence upon him. But as these prophets had always foretold the destruction of the kingdom as certain, so the irresistible power which works in history was now to show that an individual, though a king, better than all his predecessors, is too weak to arrest the ruin of the commonwealth when the time for reformation is past." The Cahner Bibel also says of Hoshea: "When he was at length seated upon the throne he showed himself personally better than all his predecessors, and nevertheless it was in his reign that the destruction was consummated." Schlier also supposes that Hoshea, in the conflict, through which it is assumed that he won the throne, "turned to the Lord more sincerely than his predecessors." There is not a word of all that, however, in the text. The words in ver. 2 do not say that he was better than all his predecessors, but only that he was not as bad as the kings before him (וְהוֹשֵׁעַ). This can only be understood, however, as applying to his immediate predecessors (Menahem, Pekahiah, and Pekah), for the word "all" is not in the text. [It is arbitrary and untenable to restrict the application of the words to these kings. The "all" is not in the text, but it is a fact that the author introduces a modification here into the standing formula which goes farther towards lessening the sweeping condemnation than any which is introduced at the mention of any other king of the northern kingdom. Jehoram is said to have been bad, but not as bad as Ahab and Jezebel (2 Kings iii. 2). In the other cases the condemnation is utter and complete. The modification introduced in reference to Hoshea, slight as it is, is, therefore, by comparison, very weighty.—W. G. S.] The statement does not apply to his personal and moral character, but to his attitude as king towards the national religion. He made his way to the throne by conspiracy and murder (chap. xv. 30), as several of his predecessors.

sors had done. He did not, therefore, have any "better principles," and was not a "better man" than they. If he had listened to the warnings of the true prophets, he would not have turned to Egypt for help, for they warned him against this as much as against Assyria. The least probable supposition of all is that Hoshea gave up the cultus which Jeroboam had introduced, for, if he had done so, then his fate would have been undeserved. [This argument is presumptuous and unfounded. All such inferences from the dispensations of Providence to the desert of those who suffer calamity are precarious and unbecoming. The special fact here at stake is insignificant, but the general principle involved in this method of argument is of the first importance.—W. G. S.] The review of the history which the author appends to the story of this reign assumes that the king adhered to Jeroboam's cultus. His case is similar to that of Jehoram, of whom it is said (chap. iii. 2): "He wrought evil in the sight of the Lord, but not like his father and like his mother, for he put away the image of Baal that his father had made. Nevertheless he cleaved unto the sins of Jeroboam." Hoshea may have differed from his immediate predecessors in the same way. Probably he was led more by political than by religious considerations, at least we find no sign at all of the latter. We have no reason at all to imagine that he was genuinely converted. For the rest, it has several times occurred in the history of the world, as Keil remarks, that the last rulers of a falling kingdom have been better than their predecessors.

2. The somewhat lengthy review which the author appends to the story of the downfall of the northern kingdom is, as Hess observes: "Almost the only instance in the Old Testament where the author departs from his usual habit of simply narrating, without inserting any comments of his own." We see from this that he was interested not only in the narrative, but also in something further. Here, where the kingdom of the ten tribes comes to an end, and disappears forever from history, was the place, if there was any, for casting a glance back upon its development and history, and for bringing together the characteristics of the story in a summary. This he does from the Old Testament stand-point, according to which God chose the people of Israel to be His own peculiar people, made a covenant with it, and took it under His especial guidance and direction for the welfare and salvation of all nations. The breach of the covenant by the northern kingdom is, therefore, in his view, the first, the peculiar, and the only cause of its final fall, and this fall is the judgment of the holy and just God. By showing this in careful detail he makes it clear to us that this is the only light in which the history can be or ought to be criticised. His mode of criticism, therefore, stands in marked contrast with that of modern critical science, which considers it its task to set aside this point of view,—to measure the history of the people of God by the same standards as that of any other ancient people. There is no other passage in the Bible where what we have called in the Introduction, § 3, the theocratic-pragmatic form of representation, is so clearly and distinctly evident as in this review. This is a proof that the author of these books was a prophet, or belonged to the prophet-class, and so that it is properly reckoned among the נביאים.

This review, however, is noticeable also in another respect, viz., that the existence of the תורה, with all its חוקים, הקפות, עדות, and משפטים, long before the time of the monarchy, and that too in a written form (ver. 37), is assumed in it as unquestioned. If the author had not known that this Law, in the form in which he was familiar with it, had existed long before the division of the kingdom, he could not have declared so distinctly and decidedly that the fall of the kingdom of the ten tribes was a divine judgment upon it for its apostasy from that Law.

3. The forced emigration of the ten tribes to Assyria was a result of the despotic principle which was accepted throughout the entire Orient, that it was right to make any revolt of subjugated nations impossible (see Ezra, on 1 Kings viii. 50). In this case it was not merely a transportation into another country, but also the commencement of the dissolution of the ten tribes as a nationality. No one particular province in Assyria was assigned to them as their dwelling-place, but several, which were far separated from one another, so that, although this or that tribe may have been kept more or less together, as seems probable from Tob. i., yet the different tribes were scattered up and down in a foreign nation, without the least organic connection with one another. They never again came together; on the contrary they were gradually lost among the surrounding nations, so that no one knows, until this day, what became of them, and every attempt to discover the remains of them has been vain. (See, on the attempts which have been made, Kell, Comm. zu den Büchern d. K. s. 311, sq.) In this particular the exile of the ten tribes differs from that of Judah and Benjamin. The exile in Babylon was temporary. It lasted for a definite period which had been foretold by the prophets (2 Chron. xxxvi. 21; Jerem. xxix. 10). It was not like the Assyrian exile, a period of national dissolution. Judah did not perish in exile; it rather gained strength, and finally came back into the land of promise, whereas, of the ten tribes only a few who had joined themselves to Judah, and become a part of it, ever found their way back. The ten tribes had, by their violent separation from the rest of the nation, broken the unity of the chosen people, and, in order to maintain this separation, they had revolted from the national covenant with Jehovah. The breach of the covenant was the corner-stone of their existence as a separate nationality. Thereby also they had given up the destiny of the people of God in the world's history. They were the larger fragment of the entire nation, but they were only a separate member which was torn away from the common stock, a branch separated from the trunk, which could only wither away. After 250 years of separate existence, when all the proofs of the divine grace and faithfulness had proved vain, it was the natural fate of the ten tribes to perish and to cease to be an independent nation. "The Lord removed them out of his sight; there was none left but the tribe of Judah alone" (ver. 18). The case was different with Judah. Although it had sinned often and deeply against its God, yet it never revolted formally and in principle from the covenant, much less was its existence built upon a breach of the covenant. It remained the supporter and the preserver of the Law, and therefore also of the promise. Its deportation was indeed a heavy punishment and a well-deserved chastisement, but it did not perish thereby, nor disappear as a nation from history, but it was preserved until He came of whom it was said: "The Lord God shall give unto Him the throne of His father David, and He shall reign over the house of Jacob forever; and of his kingdom there shall be no end" (Luke i. 32, sq.).

4. The population of the country of the ten tribes after their migration consisted, in the first place, of the few of the ancient inhabitants who had remained. That such a remnant did remain is certain, whether we assume that there were two immigrations, one under Shalmaneser and the other under Esarhaddon, or only one under the latter (see note on ver. 24 under Exegetical [See, also, the bracketed note under Exeget. and Crit., on ver. 41, for the classes among the population, and the Supplementary Note above, at the end of the Exeg. section, for the details of the re-population of the country by Sargon and Esarhaddon.]). This is proved beyond question by 2 Chron. xxx. 6, 10; xxxiv. 9; Jerem. xli. 6. Furthermore this is supported by "the analogy of all similar deportations, in which only the mass of the population was carried off, especially the classes from whom revolts might be expected, and by the fact that, in a mountainous country, it would be impossible to seize every man of the population" (Keil). [For the number of persons carried away see the inscription quoted in the Supp. Note above.] The new inhabitants, however, formed the chief portion of the population. The king of Assyria had brought them from different parts of his kingdom, which was already far extended. They did not, therefore, belong to one, but to many diverse nationalities and races. They worshipped various national divinities, and each nation amongst them had its own cultus which it retained (vers. 29-31). Their common life in the same country produced unavoidably a mixture of the various nationalities with each other as well as with the remnant of the Israelites. A nation was thus formed which lacked all unity of worship, and which, socially and religiously, formed a complete chaos. As the exiles, scattered in different localities, lost their national unity and character, so did also the few Israelites who remained in the country and formed connections with the immigrants. In place of unity there arose a complete dissolution and disintegration of the nationality of the ten tribes. They never regained their unity. The author means to say in the passage from ver. 24 on that this was the judgment of God upon the covenant-breaking and apostate people which had resisted every chastisement and every warning to reform.

5. The cultus which prevailed in the northern kingdom after the exile of the ten tribes, is commonly designated as an "amalgam of Jehovah calf-worship, and heathen idolatry" (Keil and others). But the text speaks, not of an amalgamated cultus, but of an amalgamated population (see notes on ver. 34). Jeroboam's Jehovah-worship, although it was illegal, was nevertheless monotheism. As such it simply and utterly excluded polytheism. So, for instance, Jehu, who maintained Jeroboam's cultus, rooted out idolatry with violence (chap. x. 28 sq.). Now a cultus which had for its object the one true God, and at the same time many gods, a cultus in which monotheism and polytheism were combined, is inconceivable, because it involves a fundamental contradiction. [This is unquestionably true in logic, but such inconsistencies are very common in history. The population of Samaria (see bracketed note on ver. 41 under Exeg.) had no such clear and well-defined devotion to the Jehovah-worship, even under its degraded form, and no such pure consciousness of the bearings of the various parts of their cultus upon one another, as to feel this contradiction and try to escape it. A truer conception of the state of things would be that the Jehovah calf-worship, when reestablished, took its place among the other acknowledged forms of worship. The remains of the ancient Israelitish population cultivated this worship especially, the other nationalities cultivated each its own cultus especially, and thus the various forms existed side by side, doubtless not without mutual influence on one another. This is substantially the view advocated by Bähr below, and it is far more consistent with all we know of the state of things than the amalgamation theory. The latter cannot be disposed of, however, by showing its logical inconsistency.—W. G. S.] It seems that the exiles maintained in their banishment the worship of Jehovah through Jeroboam's calf images (Tob. i. 6). It is still more probable that those who remained in Samaria did the same. The priest who was sent back to Samaria (ver. 27) was to "teach them the manner of the God of the land." He therefore took up his residence at the chief seat of Jeroboam's worship, at Bethel, which thus became once more the centre of this worship. It was not, however, the source of a new worship which combined the ancient form with idolatry. That the Jehovah-worship was maintained in the country without mixture with heathenism is shown by the statement of those who, 200 years afterwards, came to Zerubbabel and said: "Let us build with you; for we seek your God as ye do; and we do sacrifice unto him since the days of Esarhaddon, king of Assur, who brought us up hither" (Ezra iv. 2). In later times this Samaritan people "was more strict in its adherence to the Mosaic law than even the Jews" (Von Gerlach). How could this have been the case if their cultus had been mixed with idolatry from the time of the Assyrian exile onwards? The form of Jehovah-worship which Jeroboam had introduced, and heathen idolatry, existed, as a consequence of the mixed population, alongside of one another, but not in one another. Although individuals may have tried to practise both worships at once, or may have turned now to one and now to the other, the mass of the Israelites who remained held firmly to the illegitimate Jehovah-worship, so that this gradually gained the upper hand of heathenism. At the time of Christ we hear no more of the latter in Samaria. As the Samaritans recognized the authority of the whole Pentateuch, the Jews could not regard them as idolaters. They were not willing, however, to have any intercourse with them, because, in blood, they were no longer pure Israelites, and so were not a portion of the people which was sharply separated, in blood, from all heathen nations. They were considered ἀλλογενεῖς, and as such they were held in about the same estimation as the heathen (Luke xvii. 16, 18; Matt. x. 5; John iv. 9; viii. 48). The bitter hostility between the Samaritans and the Jews is to be ascribed, in great part, to the ancient, deep-rooted, never extinguished hatred of the tribes of Judah and Ephraim for one another (see 1 Kings xii., Hist. § 1.). On the Samaritans see Winer, R.-W.-B. II. s. 369; Herzog, Real-Encyc. XIII. s. 363.

6. Finally, we may here briefly take notice of the manner in which modern historians represent and judge the fall of the Kingdom of the Ten Tribes. "Samarita," says Duncker (Gesch. d. Alt. s. 443, sq.), "defended itself with the energy of despair in the determination either to preserve its independent national existence or to perish. It was only after a siege of three years' duration, and the most obstinate resistance, that the capital fell, and with it the kingdom. Without proper preparation or energetic leadership, unsupported by the natural allies in Judah or by Egypt, Israel fell after brave resistance, and so not without honor." Weber speaks in like manner of the "glorious" fall of Israel. Menzel (Staats- und Religionsgesch. s. 229) passes his judgment as follows: "The energetic prophet class, which had had so much to do with the foundation of the kingdom of Israel, had found its grave with Elisha. The prophets Amos and Hosea, who appeared during the reigns of the last kings of the house of Israel, saw their activity limited to rebukes and reproofs. The former was banished from Bethel as an inciter of sedition. The ancient prophets do not seem to have recorded anything which would cast upon the kings or the people of Israel the reproach of an idolatry which was stained by human blood, as the historical and prophetic books do for several of the kings of Judah, although they are severe enough in their denunciations of the vices, and of the illegitimate forms of worship, of the northern kingdom. It is true that the institution of the prophets had shown itself incapable of arresting the decline of the northern kingdom, or of setting up a strong dynasty in the place of the regular succession which had been broken by the overthrow of the house of Omri, and that, in Judah, the duration of the kingdom of the house of David had been preserved, by the help of the priesthood, yet even there the final ruin had only been postponed for a century." As for this last conception of the history, which in fact makes the prophets responsible for the fall of Israel, in the first place it runs directly counter to the entire history of the redemptive scheme, and in so far needs no refutation. It only shows how far astray we may go, if we give up and abandon the stand-point from which alone this history claims to be considered, and from which alone it can be understood. But the first representation quoted above is, to say the least, destitute of foundation, for the text, which says no more than that Shalmaneser, after 24 years' siege, took the city, does not by any means intend by this to chant a song of praise and glory over the fallen city. There is no syllable to imply that this siege was lengthened out by the brave and "heroic resistance" of the inhabitants. The great allied army of the Syrians and the Israelites besieged Jerusalem for a long time, and nevertheless could not take it (chap. xvi. 5), though the cowardly Ahaz did not offer heroic resistance. Shalmaneser was at the same time carrying on war with the surrounding people, by which the strength of his army was divided. Moreover, Samaria had a very strong site on a hill. Still other circumstances which are not mentioned may have conspired to lengthen out the siege. Although the city may have been bravely defended, which certainly is very possible, yet it does not follow that the northern kingdom "fell with honor." It is impossible to speak of the "glorious end" of a kingdom which was in a state of anarchy, and which was politically, morally, and religiously rotten and shattered, as the contemporary prophets testify in the plainest and strongest terms. The praise which is awarded, however, is most plainly shown to be undeserved by the review which the ancient historian himself gives of the decline and fall of Israel.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

VERS. 1-6. The last King of Israel. a) "He did, &c., yet not, &c.," ver. 2. (Though he did not go so far in wickedness as the 18 who preceded him, nevertheless he did not walk in the way of salvation. Half-way conversion is no conversion. In order to bring back the nation from its wicked ways, he should have been himself devoted to the Lord with all his heart. When people are not fully in earnest in their conversion, then there is no cessation of corruption, whether it be the case of an individual or of a State.) b) He makes a covenant with the king of Egypt, ver. 4. (By this he showed that his heart was not perfect with God. Egypt, the very power out of whose hand God had wonderfully rescued His people, was to help him against Assyria. But: "Cursed be the man," &c., Jerem. xvii. 5, 7; Hos. vii. 11-13. "Woe to them," &c., Isai. xxxi. 1. "It is better," &c., Ps. cxviii. 8, 9; xci. 1. sq.) c) He loses his land and his people and is cast into prison, vers. 4-6. (By conspiracy and murder he had attained to the throne and to the highest pitch of human greatness, but his end was disgrace, misery, and life-long imprisonment, Ps. l. 1-6. Thus ended the kingdom of Israel, Isai. xxviii. 1-4.)—CRAMER: Godless men think that they will escape punishment though they do not repent. They therefore fall into discontent; as a result of such discontent they have recourse to forbidden means, such as perjury, treachery, and secret plots. They hew them out cisterns that can hold no water, Jerem. ii. 13, for it is vain to make covenants with the goddess, and to neglect the true God (Hos. vii. 11).—STARKE: Upon him who will not be humbled by small evils God sends great and heavy ones (1 Peter v. 6).

Vers. 7-23. The fall of the kingdom of the ten tribes. a) It was the result of the sin and guilt of the people. (Separation from the other tribes and dissolution of the national unity—revolt from the national covenant and overthrow of the Law—degeneration into heathenism—persistence in sin—moral and religious corruption, Matt. xii. 25; Hos. xiii. 9.) It was a judgment of the just and holy God. ("I, the Lord, . . . give to every man according to his ways;" Jerem. xvii. 10; Rom. ii. 5, 6: "The Lord God, merciful and gracious," etc., Ex. xxxiv. 6: "God is not mocked," Gal. vi. 7. He guarded the kingdom of Israel for 250 years in patience and long-suffering. He warned, and threatened, and taught, and chastised, and sent messengers to summon them to return. When all proved vain He sent the Assyrians, the rod of His wrath and the staff of His indignation, Isai. x. 5, 6. He removed them from before His face.

The judgment never fails to come. It does not come at once, it is often delayed for centuries, but it comes at last, upon States as well as upon individuals, 1 Cor. x. 11, 12.)—BERLEB. BIBEL: Would that men, when they read such passages, would stop and think, and would enter upon a comparison between the people of God of that time and of this, and would thus make application of the lesson of history. The people of Israel were hardly as wicked as the Christians of to-day. The responsibility to-day is far greater, for they were called to righteousness under the old Law, we under the Gospel of free grace. The people of the ten tribes did not reject belief in the God who had brought them out of Egypt, when they founded the kingdom of Israel (1 Kings xii. 28), but they made to themselves, contrary to the law of this God, an image of Him. This was the beginning of their downfall, the germ of their ruin, which produced all the evil fruits which followed. This led from error to error. They commenced with an image of Jehovah; they finished with the frightful sacrifices of Moloch. He who has once abandoned the centre of revealed truth, sinks inevitably deeper and deeper, either into unbelief or into superstition, so that he finally comes to consider darkness light, and folly wisdom. So it was in Israel, so it is now in Christendom. He who abandons the central truth of Christianity, Christ, the Son of God, is in the way of losing God, for "Whosoever denieth the Son, the same hath not the Father" (1 John ii. 23).—A nation which no longer respects the word of God, but makes a religion for itself according to its own good pleasure, will sooner or later come to ruin.—Vers. 9–12. External rites of worship were not wanting in the land of Israel. In all the cities, on all the mountains and hills, under all the green trees, there were places for prayer, altars, and images, but nevertheless the true God was not known (Acts xvii. 22, 23), and no worship of the true God in spirit and in truth existed. Their heart was darkened in spite of all their worship (Rom. i. 21, 23), because they did not revere the word of God, and placed their light under a bushel. So it was at the time when Luther appeared, and so it is yet everywhere where the light of the Gospel is not set upon a candlestick that it may give light to the whole house. What is the use of crucifixes if the Crucified One dwell not in the heart, and if the flesh with its lusts be not crucified?—Vers. 13, 14. STARKE: Before God sends forth His judgments and chastisements, He sends out true and upright teachers who call the people to repentance (2 Chron. xxxvi. 15, 16).—The Lord still provides a testimony of Himself, and sends to the unbelieving and perverse world this message by His faithful servants: Turn ye from your evil ways! But, as it was with Israel, so it is still; those who preach repentance are laughed to scorn. He, however, who does not listen to the exhortation to repentance, does not remain as he was, he becomes continually worse and worse. If such a heavy punishment fell upon those who would not hear the prophets, what must those expect who do not listen to the words of the Son of God, but persevere in their unbelief and in their sins? Heb. iv. 7; x. 29. Vers. 15–17. Contempt for the covenant and for the testimonies of God makes men "vain," that is, insignificant and empty, like the heathen whose gods are nothingness. [A heathen god is nothing, a nullity, it is emptiness, a name for something which does not exist, vanity. People who worship them make themselves empty, insignificant, and vain.] The further a man removes himself from God, the more vain and insignificant he becomes, however learned and cultivated he may be, and however highly esteemed he may appear.—If an entire people falls into slavery and misery, or even loses its national existence, the reason for it must not be sought merely in external, political circumstances, but, first of all, in its apostasy from the living God and His word.—BERL. BIBEL: They rejected His ordinances, not indeed by a declaration in words, but by their life and conduct. What can be regarded among us as more explicit rejection and contempt of God, than to assert and to try to convince one's self that it is impossible to keep God's ordinances? Only look at Christ's ordinances in Matt. v., vi., and vii., and compare them with the maxims which we profess, and then say whether more of us accept than reject the former. How do we keep the covenant which we have made in baptism, to conduct ourselves as those who belong to God (Gal. v. 24)? But that covenant is the covenant of a good conscience towards God (1 Peter iii. 21). If we take up the point of "vanity," we may use the words of Eccl. i. 2. Our speeches, our works, our dress, our buildings, our food, and all our habits of mind bear testimony of its truth. They served Baal; we serve the belly, mammon, the world, nay, even the devil himself, Rom. vi. 16. They caused their children to pass through the fire; through how many dangerous fires of worldly lust we cause our children to pass? Most of them are so corrupted by false education, and so much trained to evil by false example, that finally parents and children fall together into the eternal fire.—Ver. 18. KYBURZ: The kingdom of Israel had nineteen kings, and not one of them was truly pious. Wonder not at the wrath but at the patience of God, in that He endured their evil ways for many hundred years, and at their ingratitude, that they did not allow themselves, by His long-suffering, to be led to repentance. Is it any better nowadays?—Ver. 19. RICHTER: Judah was corrupted by Israel as Germany was by France. Observe: Israel was never improved by the good which still remained in Judah, but Judah was only too often corrupted by the evil in Israel. Evil conquers and spreads faster than good.—Vers. 20–23. PFÄFF. BIBEL: When the measure of sin is full, then at last the judgments of God begin to fall (Ps. vii. 11–12).—WÜRR. SUMM.: We should see ourselves in this mirror and not bring on and hasten the ruin of our fatherland by our sins, for what here befell the kingdom of Israel, or even more, may befall us (Rom. xi. 21).

Vers. 24–41. The Land of the Ten Tribes after their Exile. a) The substitution of foreign and heathen nations for the Israelitish population, vers. 24–33. b) The religious state of things in the country, which was produced by this. CRAMER: It is indeed a great calamity when the inhabitants of a country are expelled, with their wives and children, by the invasion of foreign nations; but it is a still greater misfortune when the devil's temple is set up in places where the worship of the true God has been celebrated (Ps. lxxiv. 3).—WÜRR. SUMM.: The land in which Christ and His Apostles preached has fared as did the land of Israel; the Koran now prevails there. So also have many other cities and States fared, which now hear the doctrines of Antichrist, instead of the doctrines of Christ. Therefore we ought to guard ourselves against contempt of the word of God, that God may not be led to chastise our land and church also (Rev. ii. 5).—Vers. 25-28. The heathen immigrants imagined that, in order to get rid of the plague of the lions, it was necessary to observe particular religious ceremonies. This fancy prevails yet to a considerable extent even in Christendom. People think that they can be delivered from all sorts of evil by practising certain rites, whereas no religious acts are pleasing to Almighty God, or have value, unless they are an involuntary, direct expression of living faith, and of surrender of the heart to God.—Ver. 27. The king of Assyria, a heathen, took care that the religious necessities of his subjects should be provided for. He even sent a priest of Jehovah to teach them. Would that all Christian rulers were like him in this! Vers. 29-33. A country cannot fall lower than it does when each man makes unto himself his own god. We are indeed beyond the danger of making to ourselves idols of wood and stone, silver and gold, but we are none the less disposed to form idols for ourselves out of our own imaginations, and not to fear and worship the one true God as He has revealed Himself to us. That is the cultivated heathenism of the present day. Some make to themselves a god who dwells above the stars and does not care much for the omissions or commissions of men upon earth; others, one who can do everything but chastise and punish, or one in whose sight men forgive themselves their own sins; who does not recompense each according to his works, but forgives all without discrimination, and who opens heaven to all alike, no matter how they have lived upon earth (Jerem. x. 14, 15).—Ver. 29. CRAMER: Sketch of the papacy, under which each country, city, and house has its own divinity, its saint and patron. ("O Israel! . . . in me is thine help:" Hos. xiii. 9; see also ver. 39 of this chapter).—Ver. 33. BERL. BR. They feared the Lord and worshiped their own idols! Is not that exactly the state of things amongst us? We want to serve more than one Lord. We have invented a kind of fear of God with which the worship of gold, fame, and worldly enjoyment, and, above all, of selfishness, is not inconsistent, nay, it is rather a component part of it.—Ver. 34, sq. Decay in religious matters, lack of unity of conviction in the highest and noblest affairs, prevents a nation from ever becoming great and strong. It is a sign of the most radical corruption. Similarity of faith and community of worship form a strong uniting force, and are the condition of true national unity. The existence of different creeds and confessions by the side of one another is a source of national weakness. It is an error to try to produce this unity by force; it is a blessing only when it proceeds from a free conviction (Eph. iv. 3-6).—J. LANGE: The correct application of the lesson of this passage is to abstain from communion with whatever is inconsistent with the Christian religion, for, outside of Christianity there are, besides the errors which undermine the foundation of faith, also those ordinances of men, and service of the world and sin, which, alas! the majority, even in evangelical churches, while they have knowledge of the pure truth of the gospel, yet endeavor to unite with pure religion. Verily, to serve God and sin at the same time is as radical an apostasy from true religion as ever the errors of the Samaritans were.

THIRD PERIOD.

(727-588 B.C.)

THE MONARCHY IN JUDAH AFTER THE FALL OF THE KINGDOM OF ISRAEL.

(3 KINGS XVIII.-XXV.)

FIRST SECTION.

THE MONARCHY UNDER HEZEKIAH.

(CHAPS. XVIII.—XX.)

A.—The Reign of Hezekiah; the Invasion by Sennacherib, and Deliverance from it.

CHAPS. XVIII. AND XIX. (ISAL XXXVI. AND XXXVII.)

- 1 Now it came to pass in the third year of Hoshea son of Elah king of Israel, that Hezekiah the son of Ahaz king of Judah began to reign [became king].
- 2 Twenty and five years old was he when he began to reign [became king]; and he reigned twenty and nine years in Jerusalem. His mother's name also was Abi, the daughter of Zachariah. And he did that which was right in the sight
- 3 of the Lord, according [like] to all that David his father did. He removed the high places, and brake the images, and cut down the groves [Astarte-statues], and brake in pieces the brazen serpent that Moses had made: for unto those days the children of Israel did burn incense to it: and he [they]¹ called it Nehush-tan.² He trusted in the Lord God of Israel; so that after him was none like
- 4 him among all the kings of Judah, nor any that were before him. For he clave to the Lord, and departed not [did not swerve] from following him, but kept
- 5 his commandments, which the Lord commanded Moses. And the Lord was with him; and he prospered whithersoever he went forth [in all his goings-forth;—
- 6 i. e., in everything which he went out to do]; and [omit and—Insert —] he rebelled against the
- 7 king of Assyria, and served him not. [;] [and] He smote the Philistines, even unto Gaza, and the borders thereof, from the tower of the watchmen to the fenced city.
- 8 And it came to pass in the fourth year of king Hezekiah, which was the seventh year of Hoshea son of Elah king of Israel, that Shalmaneser king of
- 9 Assyria came up against Samaria, and besieged it. And at the end of three years they took it: even in the sixth year of Hezekiah, that is the ninth year of
- 10 Hoshea king of Israel, Samaria was taken. And the king of Assyria did carry away Israel unto Assyria, and put them in Halah and in [on the] H. bor [,] by
- 11 the river of [omit of] Gozan, and in the cities of the Medes [Media, : Because they obeyed not the voice of the Lord their God, but transgressed his covenant, and all that Moses the servant of the Lord commanded, and would not hear them, nor do them.
- 12

- 13 Now in the fourteenth year of king Hezekiah did Sennacherib king of As 14 syria come up against all the fenced cities of Judah, and took them. And Hezekiah king of Judah sent to the king of Assyria to Lachish, saying, I have offended [erred]; return from me: that which thou puttest on me will I bear.
 And the king of Assyria appointed unto [put upon] Hezekiah king of Judah 15 three hundred talents of silver and thirty talents of gold. And Hezekiah gave him all the silver that was found in the house of the Lord, and in the treasures 16 of the king's house. At that time did Hezekiah cut off [strip] the gold from [omit the gold from] the doors of the temple of the Lord, and from [omit from] the pillars which Hezekiah king of Judah had overlaid, and gave it [them] to the king of Assyria.
- 17 And the king of Assyria sent Tartan and Rabсарis and Rab-shakeh from Lachish to king Hezekiah with a great host against Jerusalem: and they went up and came to Jerusalem. And when they were come up, they came and stood by the conduit of the upper pool, which is in the highway of the fuller's field.
 18 And when they had called to the king, there came out to them Eliakim the son of Hilkiah, which was over the household, and Shebna the scribe, and Joah the 19 son of Asaph the recorder. And Rab-shakeh said unto them, Speak ye now to Hezekiah, Thus saith the great king, the king of Assyria, What confidence is 20 this wherein thou trustest? Thou sayest, (but they are but [omit they are but] vain words, [it is a saying of the lips only]) [:] I have [There is] counsel and strength for the war. Now on whom dost thou trust, that thou rebellest against 21 me? Now, behold, thou trustest upon the staff of this bruised reed, even upon Egypt, on which if a man lean, it will go into his hand, and pierce it: so is 22 Pharaoh king of Egypt unto all that trust on him. But if ye say unto me, We trust in the Lord our God: is not that he, whose high places and whose altars Hezekiah hath taken away, and hath said to Judah and Jerusalem, Ye shall 23 worship before this altar in Jerusalem? Now therefore, I pray thee, give pledges to [make a bargain with] my lord the king of Assyria, and I will deliver thee two thousand horses, if thou be able on thy part to set riders upon them.
 24 How then wilt thou turn away the face of [i.e., repulse, put to flight] one captain of [amongst] the least of my master's servants, and put thy trust on Egypt for 25 chariots and for horsemen? Am I now come up without the Lord [uninstigated by Jehovah] against this place to destroy it? The Lord said to me, Go up 26 against this land, and destroy it. Then said Eliakim the son of Hilkiah, and Shebna, and Joah, unto Rab-shakeh, Speak, I pray thee, to thy servants in the Syrian language; for we understand it: and talk not with us in the Jews' lan-27 guage in the ears of the people that are on the wall. But Rab-shakeh said unto them, Hath my master sent me to thy master, and to thee, to speak these words? hath he not sent me to the men which sit on the wall, that they may 28 eat their own dung, and drink their own piss with you? Then Rab-shakeh stood and cried with a loud voice in the Jews' language, and spake, saying, Hear 29 the word of the great king, the king of Assyria: Thus saith the king, Let not Hezekiah deceive you: for he shall not be able to deliver you out of his [my] * 30 hand: Neither let Hezekiah make you trust in the Lord, saying, The Lord will surely deliver us, and this city shall not be delivered into the hand of the king 31 of Assyria. Harken not to Hezekiah: for thus saith the king of Assyria, Make an agreement [terms,] with me by a present [omit by a present], and come out to me, and then eat ye every man of his own vine, and every one of his fig-32 tree, and drink ye every one the waters of his cistern: Until I come and take you away to a land like your own land, a land of corn and wine, a land of bread and vineyards, a land of oil olive and of honey, that ye may live, and not die:
 and hearken not unto Hezekiah, when he persuadeth you, saying, The Lord will 33 deliver us. Hath [Have] any of [omit any of] the gods of the nations delivered at all [omit at all] [each] his land out of the hand of the king of Assyria?

- 34 Where are the gods of Hamath, and of Arpad? where are the gods of Sepharvaim, Hena, and Ivah? have they delivered Samaria out of mine hand [that 35 any delivered Samaria out of mine hand]? Who are they [there] among all the gods of the countries, that have delivered their country out of mine hand, 36 that the Lord should deliver Jerusalem out of mine hand? But the people held their peace, and answered him not a word: for the king's commandment
 37 was, saying, Answer him not. Then came Eliakim the son of Hilkiah, which was over the household, and Shebna the scribe, and Joah the son of Asaph the recorder, to Hezekiah with their clothes rent, and told him the words of Rab-
 CHAP. xix. 1 shakeh. And it came to pass, when king Hezekiah heard it, that he rent his clothes, and covered himself with sackcloth, and went into the house
 2 of the Lord. And he sent Eliakim, which was over the household, and Shebna the scribe, and the elders of the priests, covered with sackcloth, to Isaiah the
 3 prophet the son of Amoz. And they said unto him, Thus saith Hezekiah, This day is a day of trouble [distress], and of rebuke [chastisement], and blasphemy [rejection]; for the children are come to the birth [opening of the womb], and 4 there is not strength to bring forth. It may be the Lord thy God will hear all the words of Rab-shakeh, whom the king of Assyria his master hath sent to reproach [blaspheme] the living God; and will reprove the words which the Lord thy
 5 God hath heard: wherefore lift up thy prayer for the remnant that are left. So the servants of king Hezekiah came to Isaiah. And Isaiah said unto them,
 6 Thus shall ye say to your master, Thus saith the Lord, Be not afraid of the words which thou hast heard, with which the servants [minions] of the king
 7 of Assyria have blasphemed me. Behold I will send a blast upon him [I will inspire him with such a spirit that], and [when—omit and] he shall hear a rumour, and [he—omit and] shall return to his own land; and I will cause him to fall by the sword in his own land.
 8 So Rab-shakeh returned, and found the king of Assyria warring against Libnah: for he had heard that he was departed from Lachish. And when he heard say of Tirhakah king of Ethiopia, Behold, he is come out to fight against thee;
 10 he sent messengers again unto Hezekiah, saying, Thus shall ye speak to Hezekiah king of Judah, saying, Let not thy God in whom thou trustest deceive thee, saying, Jerusalem shall not be delivered into the hand of the king of Assyria.
 11 Behold, thou hast heard what the kings of Assyria have done to all lands, by 12 [in] destroying them * utterly: and shalt thou be delivered? Have the gods of the nations delivered them which my fathers have destroyed; as Gozan, and 13 Haran, and Rezeph, and the children of Eden which were in Thelasar? Where is the king of Hamath, and the king of Arpad, and the king of the city of Sepharvaim, of Hena, and Ivah?
 14 And Hezekiah received the letter of the hand of the messengers, and read it: and Hezekiah went up into the house of the Lord, and spread it before the Lord.
 15 And Hezekiah prayed before the Lord, and said, O Lord God of Israel, which dwellest between the cherubim, thou art the God, even thou alone, of all the 16 kingdoms of the earth; thou hast made heaven and earth. Lord, bow down thine ear, and hear: open, Lord, thine eyes, and see: and hear the words of Sennacherib, which [he] hath sent him [omit him] to reproach the living God.
 17 Of a truth, Lord, the kings of Assyria have destroyed the nations and their
 18 lands, And have cast their gods into the fire: for they were no gods, but the work of men's hands, wood and stone: therefore they have destroyed them.
 19 Now therefore, O Lord our God, I beseech thee, save thou us out of his hand, that all the kingdoms of the earth may know that thou art the Lord God, even thou only.
 20 Then Isaiah the son of Amoz sent to Hezekiah, saying, Thus saith the Lord God of Israel, That which thou hast prayed to me against Sennacherib king of Assyria I have heard. This is the word that the Lord hath spoken concerning him:

[ORACLE OF GOD IN REGARD TO THE IMPENDING DANGER.]

[I. Scornful Rebuke of Sennacherib's Boast.]

- She despises thee, she scorns thee,—the virgin daughter, Zion!
 She wags her head at thee, the daughter, Jerusalem!
- 22 Whom hast thou insulted and blasphemed? against whom hast thou lifted voice?
 Thou hast even lifted thine eyes on high against the Holy One of Israel!
- 23 Through thy messengers thou hast insulted the Lord, and hast said:
 "I come up with my chariots on chariots" to the top of the mountains, to Lebanon's summit;
 And I hew down its loftiest cedars and its choicest cypresses;
 And I come to its summit as a resting-place,
 To its forest-grove.
- 24 I dig, and I drink the waters of foreign nations;
 Yea! I parch up with the sole of my foot all the rivers of Egypt!"

[II. Refutation of his Self-assumption.]

- 25 Hast thou not heard?—Of old time I made it—
 From ancient days I ordained its course;
 Now I have brought it to pass,—
 And thou art [my instrument] to reduce "fortified cities to heaps of ruins.
- 26 THEREFORE their inhabitants were short-handed;
 They despaired and were terror-stricken;
 They were grass of the field and green herb;
 Grass of the house-top, and corn blasted in the germ.
- 27 So, thy resting in peace, and thy going out, and thy coming in, I know;"
 Also thy violent rage against me;
- 28 For thy violent rage and thine arrogance are come up into mine ears,
 And I will put my hook in thy nose, and my bridle in thy lips,
 And I will lead thee back by the way by which thou camest.

[III. Encouragement to Judah and Hezekiah.]

- 29 And this be the sign to thee:—
 Eating one year what springs of itself from the leavings of the previous crop,
 And the second year the wild growth,
 And the third year sow, and reap, and plant vineyards, and eat their fruit.
- 30 And the surviving remnant of the house of Judah shall take root again downwards,
 And shall bear fruit again upwards;
- 31 For from Jerusalem shall go forth a remnant, and from Mount Zion a rescued band:—
 The zeal of Jehovah (of Hosts)" shall do this!

[IV. God's Decree in regard to the Crisis.]

- 32 Therefore, thus saith the Eternal in regard to the king of Assyria:—
 He shall not come against this city,
 Nor shoot an arrow there,
 Nor assault it with a shield,
 Nor throw up a siege wall against it.
- 33 By the way by which he came he shall return,
 And he shall not come against this city;—is the decree of the Eternal;
- 34 But I will protect this city to save it,
 For mine own sake and for the sake of David, my servant.

- 35 And it came to pass that night, that the angel of the Lord went out, and smote in the camp of the Assyrians a hundred fourscore and five thousand: and 36 when they arose early in the morning, behold, they were all dead [.] corpses. So Sennacherib king of Assyria departed, and went and returned, and dwelt at Nineveh.
 37 And it came to pass, as he was worshipping in the house of Nisroch his god, that Adrammelech and Sharezer his sons smote him with the sword: and they escaped into the land of Armenia [Ararat]. And Esarhaddon his son reigned in his stead.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

- ¹ Ver. 4.—[יְקָרָא] is singular, but with the indefinite subject, equivalent to an English indefinite plural.
² Ver. 4.—[נְחֹשֶׁת], the thing of brass.
³ Ver. 18.—[וְיִתְּשֵׁם];—The masculine suffix is used (though the feminine would be correct) as the more general and universal. This is not rare. Cf. Gen. xxxi. 9; Amos iii. 9; Jerem. ix. 19; 2 Sam. xx. 8; Ew. § 184, c.—In the classical passages ("Prose of the priests") such irregularities do not occur, but in the prose of less cultivated writers (laymen), in popular poetry, and in the later language, they are frequent. See ver. 16, and chap. xix. 11 (Böttcher, § 677, 8).
⁴ Ver. 16.—[הַמִּנְוֹת]—Elsewhere we find מִנְוֹת for door-posts. Bähr says that the words are synonymous, but Theinus' explanation is better. He thinks that הַמִּנְוֹת refers, not only to the door-posts, but also the door-frames, sill, and lintel; i. e., all which gives stability, strength, and shape, (מִנְוֹת), to the door-opening.—On the suffix in וְיִתְּשֵׁם, see Gramm. note 3, above.—The patach in יִתְּשֵׁם is due to the guttural which follows. Cf. chap. xxi. 8: אֲבִיר חֻקֶּיהָ (Böttcher, § 378, 1).—W. G. 8.]

⁵ Ver. 29.—Instead of מִקֵּץ, which is wanting in the text of Isaiah, we must read, with all the old versions, מִקֵּץ.—

Bähr.

⁶ Ver. 30.—[The אֵת before הַחֵיָר is wanting in Isai. xxxvi. 15. It is important as bearing on the question whether אֵת ever stands with a proper nominative. Ewald admits that, if the אֵת in this place were properly in the text, we should have one instance. He adopts the reading in Isaiah, אֵת, and says that this particle "never becomes unfaithful to its primary force so far as to designate a simple nominative" (Lehrb. § 277, d, note 2). Böttcher (§ 516, f) affirms that אֵת occurs with the nominative. Cf. Gen. vii. 23; Deut. xx. 8; 2 Sam. xxi. 32; Jerem. xxxvi. 22. These are cases where it occurs with the passive. It is used with the active, also, in the sense of "self," or "even," or "very" (this very one). Cf. chap. vi. 5, and viii. 26, Gramm. notes. The instances are certainly sufficiently strong to support the reading with אֵת which our text offers us:—"This very city," or, "This city here."

⁷ Chap. xix. ver. 2.—[מִלְשָׁרָה]: ordichum uert.

⁸ Ver. 11.—[On the suffix in לְהַחֲרִיב, see Gramm. note on chap. xviii. 13 (note 3, above).

⁹ Ver. 15.—[In Isaiah we find שָׁחַף instead of שָׁחַף]. "The suffix refers to רַבְרֵי as a singular object,—the messenger" (Theinus), so also Ewald and Keil.

¹⁰ Ver. 23.—[I prefer the chetib. Bähr adopts the keri (see Exeg. on the verse). However, as he says, the sense is the same. The idiom in the chetib is similar to the one by which it is rendered in the translation.—W. G. 8.]

¹¹ Ver. 25.—לְהַשְׁתֹּת is shortened from the keri לְהַשְׁתֹּת, which is found in Isai. xxxvii. 26.—Bähr.

¹² Ver. 27.—[It is impossible to reproduce in English the pregnant brevity of this line. Whether thou abidest at home (abstainest from any interference with other nations), or goest forth (with plans of attack and conquest), or returnest (victorious), all takes place under my cognizance (by my ordinance, and under my permission). It is folly, therefore, for thee to boast of thy deeds, as against me; it is false for thee to cite my approval; and I will punish thine arrogance which rages against my controlling hand, and only claims my approval to serve its own purpose.—W. G. 8.]

¹³ Ver. 31.—The words "of Hosts" are furnished by the keri, which inserts here the word: מַלְאָכָיו, as in Isai.

xxxvii. 32, and ix. 6.—Bähr.

PRELIMINARY REMARKS.—We have, besides the narrative before us in chaps. xviii., xix., and xx., two other accounts of Hezekiah's reign, one in Isai. xxxvi.—xxxix., and the other in 2 Chron. xxxi.—xxxii. To these authorities may be added some of the prophecies, especially of Isaiah, who had great influence at this time. The first question which arises, therefore, is this: what relation do these various accounts bear to one another?

a) The narrative in Isaiah, xxxvi.—xxxix., agrees with the one before us from chap. xviii. 13 on, with the exception of a few subordinate details, so literally, that the two cannot possibly have been produced by different authors independently of one another. The question is: whether the one served as the original of the other? or, whether both were derived independently from the same source? Different opinions are maintained in answer to these questions, but it is not necessary here to enter into a careful examination of them in detail. We limit ourselves to general and necessary considerations. Gesenius (Comment. num. Jesai. II. c. 392 sq.), following Eichhorn, sought to show in detail that the account before us is the original, and that the one in Isaiah is borrowed from it. De Wette, Maurer, Köster, Winer, and others take the same view. The chief ground for this opinion is that the text in Isaiah is comparatively more condensed, that it presents common and simple words in the place of those in the text which are rare and obscure, and that forms which belong to the later usage of the language appear in it. On the contrary, Grotius, Vitrings, Paulus, Hendewerk, and, most recently, Drechsler, have asserted the originality and priority of the account in Isaiah. In proof of this they bring forward the following considerations: The account in Isaiah cannot be borrowed from that in Kings because it contains Heze-

Isaiah's long and highly important hymn of gratitude (chap. xxxviii. 9-20), which is entirely wanting in the latter: The language in Kings is the "more careless dialect of common life," the style is "inferior," while the version in Isaiah is more rich, "more correct, and more elegant." When the opinions in regard to the style and language of the two versions are so diverse, it is impossible to deduce any arguments from this consideration for the priority of either. The truth is, as will appear from the detailed exegesis, that, as far as expression and language are concerned, sometimes one and sometimes the other version is to be preferred. The omissions are more important. The account in Isaiah cannot be borrowed from that in Kings on account of the hymn of Hezekiah; but it is just as certain that the account in Kings is not based upon that in Isaiah, for it contains additions which cannot be regarded as simple assumptions of the redactor; such, for instance, as the passages chap. xviii. 14, 15, and especially chap. xx. 7-11, compared with Isai. xxxviii. 7, 8, 21, 22. In view of the omissions which occur sometimes in one account and sometimes in the other, the majority of the modern expositors, Rosenmüller, Hitzig, Umbreit, Knobel, Ewald, Thenius, Von Gerlach, Keil, suppose that both narratives are borrowed from a common source which we no longer possess. This seems to us also to be the correct view, though we cannot agree in the opinion that the "Annals of the Kingdom" were the common source, for both accounts bear the character of prophetic, and not of mere civil, historical records. The source was more probably that collection of histories of the separate reigns, composed by different prophets, of which we spoke in the Introduction § 3. According to 2 Chron. xxxii. 33, Isaiah was the author of the history of Hezekiah, which had a place in this collection. Neither this narrative, therefore, nor the one in Isai. xxxvi.-xxxix., is Isaiah's original composition, but both are borrowed from this, which, unfortunately, we no longer possess. Both come from Isaiah originally, but neither reproduces accurately and fully the original account. Sometimes one and sometimes the other approaches nearer to the original. This view is, on the whole, the one which the editors of Drechsler's Commentar zu Jesaja (II. s. 151 sq.), Delitsch and Hahn, and the former also in his own Comm. zu Jes. (s. 24, 351 sq.), maintain. But they evidently contradict themselves when they admit, on the one hand, "that the text in the book of Kings is, in many cases, and, perhaps, in the most, to be preferred to that in Isaiah," and yet, on the other hand, assert that "the author of the book of Kings cannot have obtained the parallel account xviii. 13-20, xix. from any other source than the book of Isaiah." It is true that Delitsch appeals again and again to the relation between Jer. chap. lii. and 2 Kings xxiv. 18, sq. and chap. xxv. as "an analogous proof that the text of a passage may be more faithfully preserved in the secondary recension than in the original one, from which it was borrowed;" but, although it is possible to render a pure fountain impure, it is impossible that a pure stream should flow from a more or less impure fountain. How, then, can a secondary text be better and purer than the primary one? [The author agrees with the authorities mentioned above that both the accounts are borrowed from a third document as their source. Neither one of the accounts, therefore, as we have them, can be said to have superior claims to the other, as the primary recension. No one will deny that the ultimate human source of the words of the oracle was the brain and lips of Isaiah. Whether he himself collected and arranged his prophecies in the form in which we have them, is a question to be treated in its proper place. If we assume that he did, then it is indeed fair to suppose, wherever any doubt arises, that he cited his own words more accurately than another could do it. But now we have to take account of the history of the two texts since they left the hands of those who put the book of Kings and the book of Isaiah in the form in which they have come down to us—whichever they may have been. In the course of time the primary recension may have been copied more frequently, and by other means also have incurred more corruptions than a recension which, in the first place, was a secondary one. This is what Drechsler means when he says that a secondary recension may have retained the text until our time in a purer form than the primary recension. An element is here introduced which interferes materially with any apriori claim to superior weight which either the one or the other of the texts before us may make, as having come more directly from the hand of the original author. We are thrown back upon the critical examination of each individual variant in each account to determine which reading is more probably the "original" and correct one. The question which text presents, in the most cases, the preferable reading, is one which can only be decided by reviewing the results of these separate critical investigations.—W. G. S.] Nevertheless, we believe that the version in Isaiah was written earlier than the one in Kings, for, whatever opinion one may hold in regard to the time of composition of the second part of Isaiah (chaps. xl.-lxvi.), no one can assert that the first part (chaps. i.-xxxix.) was not composed before the end of the Babylonian Exile, which is the time of composition of the book of Kings (Introd. § 1). It does not by any means follow that this account was borrowed from Isaiah. The two accounts are independent recensions from the same original. The reason why the same passage occurs in two different books of the Bible is simply this, that in the one it is given for the sake of the prophet, and in the other for the sake of the king. The whole forms an important incident in Isaiah's work, and an important incident in Hezekiah's reign, which was an important part of the history of the kings of Judah, on account of the deliverance from Assyria.

b) The account in Chronicles condenses into very concise form the contents of the other accounts, but it contains also additions peculiar to itself. It gives (chap. xxix. 3-xxxi. 21) detailed descriptions of the rites and ceremonies which Hezekiah prescribed; especially of the Passover which he celebrated. All that has been brought forward against the credibility of this narrative has been refuted by Keil (Apolog. Versuch über die bibl. Chron. s. 399 sq.). Although it is still asserted that the Chronicler allows himself "to treat the historical facts with more freedom," yet it is admitted that his account "has the foundation of an exact historical tradition" (Bertheau, Comm. zur Chron. s. 396), and Winer says: "There is, generally speaking, nothing in it which represents the facts and incidents in a manner false to history." The account before us especially emphasizes the fact, in regard to Hezekiah's reform in worship, that he abolished idolatry, and even the Jehovah-worship upon the high places. It is a matter of course, however, that the zealously pious king did not stop with the destruction and abolition of the false worship, but also positively put in its place the one which was prescribed in the Law. This the Chronicler states distinctly, and he describes this reformed cultus in detail, in complete consistency with the tendency and stand-point of his work. For him, neither the prophetic institution nor the monarchy stands in the foreground, but the levitical priesthood. While the author of Kings fixes his attention upon the political and theocratic side of the history of Hezekiah's reign, and writes from the stand-point of the theocracy, the Chronicler fixes his attention upon those incidents of it which were important for the levitical priesthood, and writes from the stand-point of a levite. His statements are, in this case, therefore, an essential addition to the story in Kings and in Isaiah, as indeed his peculiar contributions generally supplement the narratives elsewhere found. The source from which he obtained this information was, as he himself tells us (2 Chron. xxxii. 32), "the סֵפֶר of the prophet Isaiah, the son of Amoz, in the book of the kings of Judah and Israel," that is to say, the same work to which the author of Kings refers (chap. xx. 20) for the history of Hezekiah.

c) The prophetic oracles in Isaiah and Micha contain, it is true, most important descriptions of the moral and religious state of things at the time when these prophets lived, but no history, in the proper sense of the word. Definite facts, which might supplement the historical narrative, cannot be derived from them, and it is especially vain to attempt this, since, up to the present day, there is no consensus of opinion in regard to whether particular oracles are to be assigned to the time of Hezekiah, or to that of some other king, during whose reign Isaiah also exerted influence. For instance, the first chapter of Isaiah refers, according to some modern critics, to the time of Hezekiah; according to others, to that of Uzziah; according to still others, to that of Jotham; and yet again, according to others, to that of Ahaz. We therefore adhere, in this place, since we have to deal with the firm substance of history, as closely as possible to the historical narratives, and leave it to the exposition of the prophetic books to show to what events, recorded in the historical books, the separate oracles refer.

[The author would probably be greatly misunderstood, if any one should infer from this that he estimated as unimportant the light which the prophetic oracles of the Old Testament throw upon the Jewish history. It is one of the unique and most remarkable features of the Old Testament that it presents to us side by side a section of human history, and a criticism of the same from the stand-point of the highest, purest, and most intense religious conviction. The historical narratives of the Old Testament are simple, brief, and dry annals of events and facts. The seventeenth chap. of 2d Kings presents a solitary example in which the author comes forward to discuss causes, to weigh principles, and to review the moral forces at work under the events he records. All that we call nowadays the "philosophy of history" is wanting in the strictly historical books. It is supplied by the books of the prophets. They give us an insight into the social and political status, into the vices, the moral forces, the ambitions, and the passions which were at work under the events and produced them. To modern minds the history is not by any means complete until these are elucidated. "History" is not bare events or facts. If it were, we might save ourselves the trouble of ever studying it. It would be a pure matter of curiosity. But history is the fruit of certain moral forces. We study the forces in their fruits. We deduce lessons of warning and encouragement from the study. The forces are the same now as ever since mankind lived upon the earth, and they act, under changed outward circumstances, in the same way. They will produce the same results, and the whole practical value of history is that we may profit by the accumulated experience of mankind, as the individual profits by the mistakes and sufferings of the years through which he has lived. To this end, however, insight into the moral causes of events is the valuable thing, and it is that which we must aim at in studying history. What is peculiar to the prophets of the Old Testament, as such, is that their criticisms of Jewish history were not bare literary or scholarly productions, but appeals, rebukes, and warnings, of the most personal and practical description. That is a characteristic of them which has ethical and perhaps homiletical interest, but does not contribute to our historical knowledge, while their analysis of the social condition under which these events took place, and their statement of the moral causes which produced them, are of the highest importance for the history. These fill up the back-ground, and give the light and shade, and the perspective, to a picture of which the historical books have only sketched the outline. We have a sort of parallel in the works of the ancient orators, which have contributed essentially and undeniably to our knowledge of ancient history. Such being the case, it is evident that any one who undertakes to expound the historical books must give good heed to the light which the prophetic books throw upon them. It is indeed true that it is often very difficult to assign particular oracles to their time and circumstances, but we have only to observe the wonderful light which the oracle before us (Chap. xix. 22-34), and its historical setting, throw upon one another, now that we have them in undoubted juxtaposition, to see what we may hope for, if we can succeed in fixing the connection and relations of other and similar oracles. The light to be derived from the prophecies for the history is not by any means to be lightly set aside, but it is to be regarded as one of the fruits of critical science most highly to be valued, and most earnestly to be labored for.—W. G. S.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

VER. 1. Now it came to pass, &c. It must be carefully observed that vers. 1-8 contain a summary account of the entire reign of Hezekiah, like the one given of Ahaz' reign in chap. xvi. 1-4. In the first place there is given, as usual, his age, the time of his accession, and the duration of his reign (vers. 1 and 2); then, what he did in regard to the Jehovah-worship (vers. 3 and 4); then, what spirit animated his life and conduct in general (vers. 5 and 6); finally, what successes were won, during his reign, against foreign nations (vers. 7 and 8). After this general summary follows, from ver. 9 on, the narrative of the chief events during his reign, in chronological order, viz., the overthrow of the Kingdom of the Ten Tribes, in his fourth year (vers. 9-12), and the oppression of the Assyrians, which began in his fourteenth (ver. 13 sq.).—In the third year of Hoshea. Since the fourth and sixth years of Hezekiah correspond to the seventh and ninth of Hoshea, according to vers. 9 and 10, it has often been thought that the "third year" in this statement must be incorrect (see Maurer on the passage), and it has been believed that it ought to read "in the fourth year." Josephus, in fact, has ἐτεὶ δὲ τετάρτῃ. But the explanation is that the years of the two kings do not run exactly parallel. The difficulty is removed, and the text is assured "as soon as we assume that Hoshea came to the throne in the second half of 730, and Hezekiah in the first half of 727, before Hoshea's third year had expired" (Thenius); or, "If we assume that Hezekiah's accession took place near the end of Hoshea's third year, then his fourth and sixth years correspond, for the most part, with the sixth and ninth of Hoshea" (Keil).—יְהוֹשָׁעָה is the shortened form for יְהוֹשֻׁעָה, which is found in Chronicles, and in 2 Kings xx. 10; Isai. i. 1; Hos. i. 1. In Isai. xxxvi.—xxxix. the name always has the form יְהוֹשָׁעָה. This form is also found several times in Kings. In Micah i. 1. we find יְהוֹשָׁעָה. Gesenius gives, as the signification of the name, "Jehovah's strength." Fürst's explanation is better: "Jah is Might." In like manner יְחִזְקִיָּה is shortened from יְחִזְקִיָּהוּ which is found in Chronicles. Which Zachariah was her father, we cannot determine.

Ver. 4. He removed the high-places. On בָּמוֹת see notes on 1 Kings iii. 2. Here, as in 1 Kings iii. 2, and xv. 12, 14, we have not to understand by the word, places of idolatry, but elevations on which Jehovah was worshipped, in contrast with the temple as the central place of worship. This is clear from ver. 22. On the images (probably of stone), and the wooden Astarte-columns, see note on 1 Kings xiv. 23. Instead of the singular אֲשֵׁרָה, all the old versions have the plural, which is also found in 2 Chron. xxxi. 1. Therefore Thenius reads אֲשֵׁרִים, but this change is unnecessary. According to Keil the singular is here "used collectively."—And brake in pieces the brazen serpent, &c. (cf. Numb. xxi. 5 sq.). It is commonly assumed that this refers to the serpent-image which was made by Moses in the wilderness. Von Gerlach says: "It was perhaps preserved in a side-chamber of the temple as a highly revered treasure and memorial. . . . In the times of manifold idolatry it had been brought out, and an idolatrous worship had been practised with it." It is not impossible, in itself, that the image was still in existence after 800 years, and was preserved in the temple as a relic. We have no hint, however, that such was the case, and it is hardly supposable that Moses, who so carefully avoided everything which could nourish the inclination of the people towards idolatry, should have taken this image with him during his entire journey through the wilderness. Moreover, the tabernacle had no side-chamber in which it could have been kept. Even if we suppose that it was still in existence when the temple was built (480 years after the exodus), yet there is no mention of it at all amongst the objects in the tabernacle which Solomon caused to be brought down into the temple (see 1 Kings viii. 4); neither is there any mention of the fact that any later king caused it to be brought out and set up where it would be possible for the people to offer incense to it. It is reckoned as a merit in Hezekiah that he caused it to be broken in pieces, but it is hardly probable that he would have been the one to destroy a symbol which had been set up and preserved by the great Law-giver himself, and which had survived so long, as a sacred memorial and treasure, all the storms of time. Winer (R.-W.-B. II. s. 415) therefore infers "The brazen serpent mentioned in 2 Kings cannot be the very one which was set up by Moses." If the sensuous people wished to see their God and to have an image of Him, scarcely any image would suggest itself more immediately than the one which Moses had himself once made and commanded them to look upon, and of which the people were so directly reminded by their history. In the time of idolatry, therefore, they made an image like the one which Moses had set up, and offered incense to it. The text, seems to us not only to admit this supposition, but also, when taken with the context, even to require it. The clause: that Moses had made, distinguishes this image expressly from the statues and images mentioned just before. They had been borrowed from the heathen, but that, though it had been made by Moses in the first place, had been abused for idolatry. Moreover, Moses had not made it with his own hands, but had caused it to be made. This also does away with the oft-repeated assertion that the serpent-worship in Israel had its origin in Egypt, where this cultus was very widespread. The serpent was there the symbol of healing power (Winer, l. c.), whereas in the book of Numbers it is represented as bringing death and destruction, wherefore Moses, who certainly was far enough from intending to thereby set up an image of idolatry, hung up a serpent-image as a sign that it could not bring death to those who, with faith in Jehovah's death-conquering power, should look up to it.—Unto those days, i. e., not from Moses' time on uninterruptedly until the time of Hezekiah, but "from time to time, and the idolatrous worship which was practised with this image continued until Hezekiah's time" (Keil). The subject of יָמָיו is not Hezekiah, as the Vulg. and Clericus understand, but Israel. Sept. ἐκείνων. [It is better to take it as a singular with indefinite subject (one called) = they called, or it was called. See note 1 under Grammatical.] The name נְחֹשֶׁתֶת, i. e., "a brazen thing," shows that the "brass" was not an accidental circumstance in the construction of this image, but was essential, perhaps on account of its glowing-red color, in which it resembled the "fiery" serpents (Numb. xxi. 6; Deut. viii. 15; cf. Rev. i. 15), whose bite burned and consumed. נְחֹשֶׁתֶת, therefore, meant, The Glowing-red One, The Consuming One, The Burning One. There is no contemptuous sense in it, such as: "A little bit of brass," as those think who assume that Hezekiah is the subject (Deresser). Still less is it correct that the image had that name only in contrast with the other idols which were of wood or stone. Neither is the designation: "The so-called Brass-God" (Ewald), an apt rendering of the word.—The sentence in ver. 5: After him was none like him, &c., has been incorrectly understood as a proverbial form of expression for something which is very rare, the parallel of which is not on record. It "is not in contradiction with chap. xxiii. 25, for its application must be restricted to the single characteristic of trust in God. In this particular Hezekiah showed himself the strongest, whereas, in xxiii. 25, strict fidelity to the (Mosaic) Law is applauded in Josiah" (Thenius).—He clave to the Lord (ver. 6). This appeared from the fact that he never gave himself up to idolatry, but kept the commandments of God.

Ver. 7. And the Lord was with him, &c.

יְהוָה עִמּוֹ has exactly the same sense as in 1 Kings ii. 3. The words וְיָהוָה עִמּוֹ are not to be translated as by Luther and De Wette [and the E. V.]: "Whithersoever he went forth," but, as by the Vulg.: in cunctis, ad quæ procedebat. His prosperity appeared in two points; in his escape from the Assyrian supremacy, under which Judah had disgracefully fallen during Ahaz' reign (chap. xvi. 7); and in his war against the Philistines, who had, during Ahaz' reign, made conquests in Judah (2 Chron. xxviii. 18). Luther's translation, Dazu [d. i. ausserdem] ward er [Moreover he rebelled], destroys the connection of thought. The וְ before

יְהוָה is the simple copula, and is equivalent to the German nämlich [that is to say, or, for instance]. As those two facts only are mentioned here as instances of his prosperity, we must not infer from their position in the story that they took place at the outset of his reign. It is to be observed that his revolt from Assyria is not mentioned here as something blameworthy, but as something which redounded to his praise. The apostate Ahaz subjected the kingdom to Assyria; Hezekiah, who was faithful to Jehovah, made himself independent of the Assyrian yoke. As to the time at which he resolved to do this, see note on ver. 13.

Ver. 9. And it came to pass in the fourth year of King Hezekiah, &c. Vers. 9-12 repeat what has been already narrated in chap. xvii. 3-6. This is due, according to Thenius, to the fact that the author found these words not only in the annals of Israel, but also in those of Judah, and that he reproduces his authorities with "complete fidelity." But the repetition cannot be due to any such merely mechanical procedure; it has a further and deeper cause. In the first place, the overthrow of Samaria was an event of the highest importance for Judah also, and it deserved especial mention here on account of the contrast with vers. 1-8. Hezekiah carried out a reformation in his kingdom. He remained faithful to the Lord, and he succeeded in what he undertook. Israel, on the contrary, had come into conflict with the Assyrian power. The king of Assyria, encouraged and stimulated by his success in this conflict, now turned his arms against Judah. But this kingdom, although it was weaker and smaller, did not fall, because Hezekiah trusted in the Lord. This is what the historian desired to show by the repetition, so that it is exactly in its right place between vers. 8 and 13.—For the detailed exposition of vers. 9-12, see notes on chap. xvii. 3 sq.

Ver. 13. Now in the fourteenth year . . . did Sennacherib . . . come up, &c. Herodotus calls this king Zavaxaribos; Josephus, Σενναχάρβος. Nothing but guesses, which we do not need to notice, have yet been brought forward in regard to the signification of this name. [The true form of the name is Sin-akhe-rib, and it means: "Sin (the Moon-god) has multiplied brothers."—Lenormant.] Sennacherib was the immediate successor of Shalmaneser, for Sargon (Isai. xx. 1) is, as was remarked above on chap. xvii. 3, one and the same person with Shalmaneser. [For a correction of this error see the Supplementary Note after the Ezeg. section on chap. xvii., and also the similar note at the end of this present section.] Delitsch (on Isai. xx. 1) has lately once more denied this on the authority of the Assyrian inscription published by Oppert and Rawlinson, and has ventured this assertion: "He [Sargon], and not Shalmaneser, took Samaria after a three years' siege. . . . Shalmaneser died before Samaria, and Sargon not only assumed command of the army, but also seized the reins of power, and, after a conflict of several years' duration with the legitimate heirs and their party, he succeeded in establishing himself upon the throne. He was, therefore, a usurper." The biblical text is wholly silent in regard to all this; nay, it even contradicts it. For the "king of Assyria" mentioned in chap. xvii. 4, 5, and 6, is necessarily the same one who is mentioned in ver. 3 just before, viz., Shalmaneser. It is impossible to insert another king, and he a usurper, between these four successive verses. If Sargon was a different person from Shalmaneser, the statements of the biblical text in chap. xvii. 3-6 are incorrect; if these are correct, then either the Assyrian inscriptions are incorrect, or they are incorrectly read and interpreted. Sennacherib would hardly have called his predecessors his "fathers," if the supposititious Sargon had been a usurper who had come to the throne by the overthrow of the reigning dynasty.

[The reading and interpretation of the cuneiform inscriptions cannot yet, it is true, be regarded as beyond all question, yet there are certain results which are now placed beyond doubt. They constitute the highest authority for Assyrian history, and by them nothing is more satisfactorily established than the fact that Sargon succeeded Shalmaneser and was a usurper, and Sennacherib was his son. The above quotation from Delitsch correctly states the facts of the case. If the inscriptions are not correctly interpreted it remains for those who are competent to do so to make the necessary corrections; but those who have not mastered the subject (and it is a very difficult one) are not justified in treating the authority of Assyrian scholars with neglect and contempt, even upon the supposed authority of the biblical text. The author of the book of Kings was an inhabitant of Judah. Before the time of Sennacherib this kingdom had had very little to do with Assyria. Even Israel knew "the king of Assyria" only as an enemy, the head and representative of the great and threatening world-monarchy. They did not fear Shalmaneser or Sargon as individuals: they feared the head of the hostile nation, "the king of Assyria." Shalmaneser was celebrated for his campaign against Tyre as an individual who bore this dreaded title. If, as is supposed, he began the siege of Samaria, but died during it, and if Sargon finished it, but then returned to Assyria to secure his usurped power—(Rawlinson seems to think that he was not at Samaria, but took advantage of the discontent of the people of Nineveh at Shalmaneser's long absence to raise a rebellion against him, and then counted among the great deeds of his first year the conquest of Samaria, which Shalmaneser, or his generals, had nearly accomplished)—then it is not strange that his name is not mentioned here among those individuals who were known to the author of these books to have worn the crown of Assyria. Sennacherib was his son, and again so far from his mention of "his fathers" being an argument that he was not the son of a usurper, it is rather in character for such a person to boast of his ancestors, to try to obliterate the recollection of his origin and title to the throne, and to endeavor to avail himself of the prestige of the old dynasty. The Bible is silent in regard to all this, it is true, but it is generally silent in regard to contemporaneous Assyrian, Babylonian, Egyptian, and Greek history. Of China, India, and Arabia it tells us nothing. For our knowledge of these things we are thrown upon the proper authorities. The silence of the Bible is no disparagement of the Bible, and no argument against the conclusions to which we may be led by such separate national authorities as we possess. For the facts in regard to the question here before us, as they appear from the Assyrian inscriptions, see the Supplementary Note at the end of this Exeg. section, and for a list of the Assyrian kings, with the dates of their reigns, see the right-hand column of the Chronological Table at the end of the volume.—W. G. S.]

The fourteenth year of Hezekiah, who became king in 727, is the year 713. The fall of Samaria took place in 721 (see the Chron. Table). How long after that Shalmaneser reigned cannot be determined [by biblical data]. The ordinary opinion that he lived until 718, and that Sargon reigned from 718 to 715 or 714, falls to the ground when the identity of the two is established. Sennacherib seems to have reigned a year or two before he undertook the great expedition. Probably the change of occupant of the throne of Assyria had encouraged Hezekiah to make himself independent of the oppressor (ver. 7). It is not likely, as Niebuhr supposes, that he attempted this soon after his accession, for then Shalmaneser would not have retired from Samaria in 721 without chastising him for this revolt. It is not especially stated what caused the expedition of Sennacherib, but it certainly was not the revolt of Hezekiah alone. It was an expedition of conquest, directed especially against Egypt, which was then the great rival of Assyria, under whose protection the small kingdoms of Western Asia ranged themselves against Assyria. We do not know certainly whether Hezekiah entered into an alliance with Egypt after he revolted from Assyria. It is clear from Isai. iii. 1; xxxi. 1, compared with vers. 21 and 24 of this chapter, that the authorities at Jerusalem were much inclined to this course, and that they had taken preliminary steps towards it. We shall recur to the subject of Sennacherib's expedition against Egypt below, at the end of the Ex- egetical notes. [See the Suppl. Note after this Exeg. section. The facts as established by the inscriptions, are there briefly stated. All that is said above about the relations of Jewish and Assyrian history must be corrected by what is stated in the Note below.]—Against all the fenced cities of Judah, &c. The statement in Chronicles is more accurate: "He encamped against the fenced cities and thought to win them for himself" (2 Chron. xxxii. 1). It is clear from xix. 8 that he did not take them all. When he approached with his great army, Hezekiah armed himself to resist, and, as he could not risk a battle in the open field, he set Jerusalem in the best possible condition for defence (2 Chron. xxxii. 2 sq.; Isai. xxii. 9, 10).

Ver. 14. And Hezekiah . . . sent to the king of Assyria, &c. Vers. 14 to 16 are entirely wanting in Isaiah, and are an important addition to the narrative there given. They are evidently taken from the common source. They are not, therefore, "a mere annalistic insertion" (Delitsch). The text of Isai. is here condensed as it is in the following verse (17), where he only mentions Rabshakeh, and says nothing about Rabaris and Tartan.—Lachish, whither Hezekiah sent his messengers, was fifteen or eighteen hours' journey southwest of Jerusalem on the road to Egypt (see note on chap. xiv. 19). Sennacherib had, therefore, already passed Jerusalem on his way to Egypt. "The possession of this city was, on account of its position, a matter of great importance to an army which was invading Egypt" (Thenius). Hezekiah, therefore, had grounds for extreme anxiety, more especially as there was no sign of movement on the part of any Egyptian force to meet Sennacherib, and Judah seemed to have been abandoned by Egypt. He determined to try to make terms with the powerful enemy, and rather to submit to a heavy tribute in money than to risk the possession of his capital and the independence of his kingdom. מִתְּנִיָּהּ does not mean: I have sinned against God by my revolt from thee (that would require that מִתְּנִיָּהּ should be added, as we find it Gen. xlii. 13; xxxix. 9; 1 Sam. vii. 6; 2 Sam. xii. 13 and elsewhere); nor, as the ancient expositors supposed: I have, in thy opinion, sinned; nor, imprudenter egi. We have simply to adhere to its original signification, to fail, to err (Job v. 24; Prov. xix. 2). "It is an acknowledgment wrung from him by his distressed circumstances" (Thenius). Hezekiah admits, in view of the great danger to which he has exposed himself and his kingdom, that he has committed an error.—The sum which Sennacherib demanded was certainly a very large one. Thenius estimates it at one and a half million thalers ($1,080,000), and Keil at two and a half million thalers ($1,800,000). The reduction to terms of our modern money is very uncertain. The fact that Hezekiah stripped off the metal which he had himself put upon the door-casings shows how difficult it was for him to raise this sum.

Ver. 17. And the king of Assyria sent Tartan, &c. Josephus thus states the connection between vers. 16 and 17. Sennacherib had promised the ambassadors of Hezekiah that he would abstain from all hostilities against Jerusalem, if he received the sum which he had demanded. Hezekiah, trusting in this, had paid it, and now believed himself to be free from all danger. Sennacherib, however, "did not trouble himself about his promise. He marched in person against the Egyptians and Ethiopians, but he left the general (σπαρτηγός) Rab-shakeh, with two other high officers (σὺν δυνάμει) ἀλλοις τῶν ἐν τέλει and a large force to destroy Jerusalem." This undoubtedly fills up correctly the omission of the biblical text. The two last of these names are clearly official titles, but the first is not a proper name. See Jerem. xxxix. 3, 13, where these titles stand by the side of the proper names. מַלְאָכָא is the title of the general or military commander, as we see from Isai. xx. 1. Probably it is equivalent to מַלְאָכָא (chap. xxv. 8; Jerem. xxxix. 9; Gen. xxxvii. 36), captain of the life-guard. We pass, without discussion, Hitzig's suggestion that the title is of Persian origin and means, "Skull of the body," that is, "Person of high rank." מַלְאָכָא is the chief of the eunuchs, who, however, was not himself a eunuch (chap. xxv. 19; cf. Gen. xxxvii. 36; xxxix. 1, 7; Dan. i. 3, 7). This officer is now one of the highest at the Turkish court (Winer, R.-W.-B. II. s. 654). All the officers and servants of the court were under his command. מַלְאָכָא is the chief cup-bearer, who is more distinctly designated in Gen. xl. 2, 21 as מַלְאָכָא. This was also a post of high honor at Oriental courts. Nehemiah once filled it (Nehem. i. 11; ii. 1). These court dignitaries were at the same time the highest civil and military officers (cf. Brissonius de regno Pers. i. p. 66, 138. Gesenius on Isai. xxxvi. 2). Sennacherib sent three such officers in order to give importance to the matter.—The upper pool is the one called Gihon (2 Chron. xxxii. 30; 1 Kings i. 33) outside of the city, on the west side. A canal ran from this to the field of the fullers or washers, which, partly on account of the impurity of the water collected in the pool, and partly on account of the uncleanness of that occupation, was outside of the city. The same designation of this locality is found in Isai. vii. 3, from which it is clear that this canal existed in the time of Ahaz and earlier, and is not the one mentioned in 2 Chron. xxxii. 30.—

And when they had called to the king, &c., i. e., "They made known to those upon the wall their desire to speak with the king. He, however, did not yield to their demand to speak with him in person, not, as Josephus thinks, πρὸς δεῖλιας, but because it was beneath his dignity. The chief officers of the king appeared" (Thenius). On the offices which they filled, see notes on 1 Kings iv. 3 sq. From Isai. xxii. 15–22 it is commonly inferred that Shebna, who there appears as the officer

עֶלֶי הַבֵּית, but is threatened with deposition from that office, had been degraded to a סֹפֵר, in which rank he appears here, and that Eliakim had been put in his place. Other expositors, Vitringa for instance, will not admit that he is the same person. It is at best very uncertain. Nothing can be inferred from this in regard to the comparative rank of these officers, for in 1 Kings iv. 3 sq. the Sopher and the Maskir stand before the Master of the Palace.

Ver. 19. And Rab-shakeh said unto them, &c. Probably he was more familiar with the Hebrew language (ver. 26) than either of the others, and otherwise better fitted to be spokesman. The rabbis falsely consider him an apostate Israelite and even a son of Isaiah.—Rab-shakeh calls his king "the great king," because he had kings for his vassals, Isai. x. 8; Hos. viii. 10. Cf. Ezek. xxvi. 7; Dan. ii. 37, where Nebuchadnezzar is called a "king of kings." In Ezra vii. 12, the name is applied to the Persian king.—מַלְאָכָא does not mean defiance (Bunsen: "What is this defiant confidence with which thou defiest"?), but confidence, reliance: cf. מַלְאָכָא in ver. 5. The question does not contain a rebuke (Gesen.: qualis est fiducia ista: i. e., quam insans ea est); but rather astonishment. "What reliance hast thou that thou dardest to revolt from me? I look about in vain for any satisfactory answer to this question" (Drechsler).—

מַלְאָכָא in ver. 20 is to be preferred to מַלְאָכָא in Isai. A saying of the lips only is not object: "Thou speakest but a word of the lips [when thou sayest]: counsel and strength, &c." (Knobel). Still less is the sense: "Thou thinkest that my words are only empty talk." The sense is rather: "Thou sayest" (it is, however, no well-considered expression of a conviction, but a mere pronunciation of the lips) "counsel and strength," &c., cf. Proverbs xiv. 23; Job xi. 2. The Vulg. translates very arbitrarily: Forstian inisti consilium, ut prepares te ad praelium. Ver. 21 is not a question (Vulg. Luther). Rab-shakeh himself gives the answer to his own question in ver. 20, and "affirms roundly that Judah is in alliance with Assyria's arch-enemy, Egypt" (Knobel). The image of the staff (מַלְאָכָא, cf. Isai. iii. 1) of a reed is a very striking one. As it is used also in Ezek. xxix. 6 in reference to Egypt, it evidently is suggested by the fact that the Nile, the representative river of Egypt, produced quantities of reeds (Isai. xix. 6). The reed, which at best has a feeble stem, bent hither and thither by the wind, is moreover "bruised," so that, although it appears to be whole, yet it breaks all the more easily when one leans upon it, and moreover, its fragments penetrate the hand and wound it (cf. Isai. xlii. 3, where רִצָּץ and שִׁבְרָא are accurately distinguished from one another). [For רִצָּץ, Germ. knicken, we have no precise equivalent. It is a kind of breaking which applies peculiarly to green reeds. The stem may be broken in such a way as to destroy its rigidity, its power to sustain any weight upright, and yet the tenacity of the fibre is such that the parts hold together, and the external form is maintained. A reed is not available as a staff under any circumstances. One which has been thus impaired will give way at once under any weight.—W. G. S.] Thenius: "Sennacherib compared Egypt to a reed thus snapped or bent, not because he had broken the Egyptian power, but because, in his arrogance, he regarded it already as good as broken." Delitsch thinks that he calls it so "in consequence of the loss of the dominion over Ethiopia, which had been lost by the native dynasty of Egypt (Isai. xlviii)." What is here said about Pharaoh agrees exactly with Isai. xxx. 1–7.

Ver. 22. But if ye say unto me, &c. In Isai. xxxvi. 7 we find instead of מַלְאָכָא, תַּאמַר, thou sayest. Keil considers this the original reading, because in ver. 23 sq. Hezekiah is once more directly addressed in his ambassadors. The majority, however, from Vitringa on, are in favor of הַמֶּלֶךְ, because Hezekiah is immediately afterwards referred to in the third person. In this case the words are not addressed simply to the ambassadors but to the entire people. Thenius takes the question, Is not that he, &c., as a continuation of the speech of those who trust in Jehovah, and who thus refer to Hezekiah's zeal for the centralization of the national cultus as a ground for hoping for God's help. But 2 Chron. xxxii. 12 is opposed to this notion. According to that passage the words are an objection raised by Rab-shakeh in order to overthrow the confidence of the people, and thus they are understood by nearly all the commentators, ancient and modern. The conclusion of the speech, ver. 25, requires the same interpretation. The argument is: God is not with the one who has removed His altars and restricted His worship to one single place, but with the one who, at His command, has taken possession of the country, and has already won such great success. Rab-shakeh desires to inspire them with suspicion of Hezekiah, who, according to ver. 30 and 2 Chron. xxxii. 7, had encouraged them to trust in Jehovah. He knew how much the people were accustomed to the worship on the high-places, and how much more convenient it was for them.

Ver. 23. Now, therefore, make a bargain with, &c. וְהָיָה i. e., Take account, moreover, of the lack of a proper military force, of which cavalry forms an important part. הַיָּמִינִי does not mean:

"Promise to my Lord" (Luther), nor, "lay a wager with my Lord" (Bunsen, Von Meyer). עָרַב means to change, exchange, barter (Ezek. xxvii. 9, 27). In the hithpael it means to enter into intercourse with (Ps. cvi. 35; Prov. xxiv. 21). The reference here is to a mutual giving and taking, not to entering into a contest (Knobel). The sense is: Even if any one should give thee ever so many horses, thou hast not men who are fit to ride upon and use them. [It is a strong expression of contempt for the military power of the Jews. You talk about opposing me by force, but even if I, your enemy, should furnish you with horses, you could not find men to form cavalry. If you should make terms with me so that I gave you these odds, it would not do you any good.—W. G. S.] הַיָּמִינִי means literally: to cause to face about, i. e., to put to flight. The פְּרוֹתֵי, the governors of provinces, were likewise commanders in the army in time of war, 1 Kings xx. 24 (cf. xlii. 31): "the least" is the one who commands the smallest number of soldiers. Drechsler's interpretation seems to us to be entirely mistaken. According to him there is no reference here to war, and הַיָּמִינִי, &c.

has the signification: to reject a suppliant, so that the sense is, "He [Hezekiah] will have to concede every demand and yield to every wish which is brought before him by such a person [as one of these governors]."—On the chariots see 1 Kings x. 28 sq.—In ver. 25 Rab-shakeh presents the matter in a light exactly contrary to that in which the Jews look at it: So far from they being justified in relying upon Jehovah, He is, on the contrary, on our side, and it is by His command that we are come hither to destroy Jerusalem. This was, as Clericus says, purum putum mendacium.

As an Assyrian he did not believe at all in the God of Israel, but only made use of this form of statement, cf. vers. 34 and 35. It can hardly be that he meant to refer to the successes which the Assyrians had had up to this time as proofs that they were under the guidance and approval of Jehovah (Calmet, Thenius). Still less can we suppose that he "had heard of the declarations of the prophets, who had predicted this distress as a punishment sent by Jehovah" (Knobel, Von Gerlach, Keil, Vitringa and others.) [At the same time, if we impute to Rab-shakeh such a disbelief in the existence of Jehovah as makes his reference to His providence here a pure fiction, merely assumed for the purpose of producing an effect upon the listeners who did believe in Jehovah, we shall introduce a modern or monotheistic idea into the speech of an ancient heathen and polytheist, to whom it was foreign. The characteristic of the Jewish monotheistic religion was exclusiveness, intolerance. The polytheistic heathen religions did not deny the existence of the national divinities of each separate nation. The fact that Rab-shakeh believed in the Assyrian divinities does not, therefore, exclude all belief on his part in Jehovah. In ver. 12 he assumes the existence of gods of the countries mentioned. In xvii. 26 we have another instance of the usual heathen conception. That was, that every nation had its own divinities. These were conceived of as existing and being true gods, one as much as the other, in all the sense in which heathen ever conceived of gods as truly existing. Each nation held its own god or gods to be greater and mightier than those of other nations, but thought it necessary, especially when in a foreign country, to pay proper respect to the local divinity. Rab-shakeh no doubt went thus far, at least, in his "belief in" Jehovah, and his claim to enjoy the favor of Jehovah was either a pure assumption, good at least until the event contradicted it, or it was founded upon the successes hitherto won, or it took advantage of such prophecies of the Jewish prophets as he may have heard of. Cf. the bracketed note on p. 57 of Pt. II. in regard to Naaman's idea of Jehovah.—W. G. S.]

Ver. 26. Then said Eliakim, &c. As the haughty words of Rab-shakeh, especially what he had last said (ver. 25), might have a depressing effect upon the soldiers posted on the wall, the king's ambassadors interrupted him and begged him, in a friendly manner, to speak Syriac. To this he gives a rude answer. אַרְמִיָּה i. e., Syriac,—

[more strictly and correctly, Aramaic. The name Syriac is commonly restricted to a later dialect of the Aramaic.—W. G. S.]—"was spoken in ancient times in Syria, Babylonia, and Mesopotamia" (Gesenius). It was "the connecting link between the languages of Eastern [middle] Asia and the Semitic languages of Western Asia" (Drechsler). On account of the intercourse between the Hebrews and these nations, the high court-officials especially were acquainted with Hebrew. The Hebrew and the Aramaic were closely related languages (Ez. iv. 7). Rab-shakeh spoke Hebrew in this case, not out of politeness, but in order that he might be understood by the listening people, who were not acquainted with any other language. His object was to influence the common people. עַל and בְּ in ver. 27 have no distinction of meaning.

In Isai. xxxvi. 12 we find לֵאלֹהֵי עַל for עַל. Rab-shakeh pretends to be a friend of "the people." So he says, in substance: Ye are abusing your common people. In exposing them to a wasting siege ye are bringing them, with yourselves, into the direst extremity, so that they will at last be compelled to consume their own excrement. (Compare similar abominations, chap. vi. 28, sq.) "Instead of the vulgar word חֲרָאִיָּהוּ, excrementa sua, and שִׁינִיָּהוּ, urinas suas, the keri substitutes the euphemisms חֲרָאִיָּהוּ their out-going, and שִׁינִיָּהוּ the water of their feet. The text is punctuated for these readings" (Knobel). וַיִּשְׁמָעוּ stands here as in 1 Kings viii. 32. Ewald: "He now, for the first time, took up a position directly in front of the wall." It can hardly mean what Keil understands: "He took up a position calculated for effect. He does exactly the contrary of what they begged him to do. He approaches nearer in order to be still more distinctly heard by the people," and "follows still more directly his object of influencing the minds of the common soldiers" (Drechsler).

Ver. 31. Make terms with me, &c. Vulg.: Facite mecum quod vobis est utile. Luther: Accept my favor. But בְּרָכָה means blessing, and implies the same as שָׁלוֹם, peace, prosperity (Josh. ix. 15), for peace was concluded with mutual blessings, and expressed wishes for prosperity on either hand (1 Chron. xviii. 10). Come out to me, the usual expression for besieged who "go out" and surrender to the besiegers (1 Sam. xi. 3; Jerem. xxi. 9; xxxviii. 17). The threats are now followed by wheedling and promises. Then eat ye, &c.; i. e., ye shall lead a life which is in every way peaceful and happy. See 1 Kings iv. 25. Until I come, ver. 32. Not, "until I come back from Egypt" (Knobel), but, in general, I will come and take you away. It appears, therefore, that, "Even in case of a capitulation, the Assyrians proposed to transport the Jewish population, according to their usual custom. For the proofs that they were accustomed to adopt this measure with all subjugated nations see Hengstenberg, De rebus Tyriis, p. 51. sq." (Keil). [On these deportations see the Supplementary Note after the Exeg. section on chap. xvii. The first one on record is there noticed, as well as a large number both out of, and into, Syria and Samaria.] We need not attempt to define the land referred to. The whole promise was a mere pretext. עֵץ זַיְתוֹן is the olive-tree which bears oil-producing fruit, in distinction from the wild olive-tree.

Ver. 33. Have the gods of the nations delivered each his land, &c. Finally the speaker puts the Assyrian power (the "king of Assyria" is here used generally for the Assyrian imperial power, not for Sennacherib in particular) above the might of all the national divinities, and therefore above the supposititious god Jehovah, and proves the justice of the assumption by those successes of the Assyrian power which no one could deny. It is very skillful of him to close his speech with this argument which he considers the strongest and most effective. He means to say: If all the gods of these numerous and mighty nations could not resist the might of Assyria, "much less will J ho-vah, the insignificant god of an insignificant nation, be able to do so" (Knobel). It is true that he thereby falls into a contradiction of what he had himself said in ver. 25, and this shows that his words there were empty pretence.—In ver. 34,

Drechsler translates אֱלֹהֵי both times by the singular, following the Vulgate. But as it must be taken as a plural in ver. 33, so also here, especially as it is a fact that those nations had more than one god each. On Hamath, Sepharvaim, and Joah see notes on chap. xvii. 24, 30 sq. Many hypotheses have been suggested in regard to Arpad. As it is mentioned here and Isai. x. 9, xxxvii. 13, and Jerem. xlix. 23, in connection with Hamath, it must have belonged to Syria. We have "no trace of it either in writings or elsewhere" (Winer). It cannot be certainly affirmed that the district Arfad in northern Syria, seven hours' journey north of Haleb (Keil), is the same place. Hena is also mentioned with Joah in chap. xix. 13, and in Isai. xxxvii. 13, but its location is as little ascertainable as that of the latter place. It is more probable that we must look for it in Mesopotamia (Winer) than on the Phœnician frontier (Ewald). [In 742, when Tiglath Pileser conquered Syria (see Supp. Note on chap. xv. p. 161), the city of Arpad alone resisted him with any success. It held out for three years. The same city joined Samaria and Damascus in the revolt mentioned in the Supp. Note on chap. xvii. p. 189. Sargon reconquered it. It is, therefore, certain that it was in Syria, though the identification with Arfad is doubtful. It was a large and important city, for it is mentioned in the acts of Sargon, together with Hamath, Damascus, Syria, and Samaria, as among the chief cities of that part of the world.—Some good maps offer Hena in the Euphrates valley and identify it with Anah, or Anatho. Sepharvaim was certainly in the Euphrates valley (see Exeg. note on xvii. 24) and it is very probable that Hena and Ivah were also there.—W. G. S.] The Vulg. which Luther, Clericus, and Thénien follow, takes בְּיַהֲזֵקְךָ as a question. Thénien even considers הָיָה the original reading. But it cannot well be taken differently from בְּיַהֲזֵקְךָ in the following verse, where there certainly is not a question, but an inference, as in ver. 20. The sentence is abbreviated. In full it would read: Where are the gods of Samaria that they should have saved it? Jehovah will be just as unable to save Jerusalem. The gods of Samaria are included in those "of the nations."—But the people held their peace, ver. 36. In Isaiah the word הָעָם is wanting, so that הַחֲרָשִׁים only refers to the three officers. Of course Hezekiah had forbidden them to reply, or to enter into any negotiations, partly because he reserved this responsibility to himself, and partly in order not to provoke the enemy still more. Because they kept silence, the people, to whom Rab-shakeh had addressed his last words, also kept silence. Hezekiah could not have commanded the people to keep silence, because he did not know beforehand that Rab-shakeh would address himself to them instead of to the ambassadors. The latter returned with rent garments, in grief and sorrow, not only for the hard message which they had to bring, but also on account of the insults to the king, and still more on account of the blasphemies against Jehovah, which they had been obliged to hear. See chap. vi. 30.

Chap. xix. ver. 1. And it came to pass when king Hezekiah heard it, &c. The sackcloth which Hezekiah put on was not only a garment of sorrow, but also a garment of penitence, as in 1 Kings xx. 32; 2 Kings vi. 30. The king saw in this event a divine chastisement (ver. 3). The rabbis use the passage to prove that when blasphemies are uttered, not only those who hear them, but also those to whom they are reported, ought to rend their garments (See Schöttgen, Hor. Hebr. on Matt. xxvi. 65). Hezekiah goes into the temple, "in order to humble himself before God and to pray for help" (Thenius). At the same time he sends a solemn embassy of the highest officers and the most important men to the prophet Isaiah. The elders of the priests are the most notable amongst them. "Embassies are often sent to the prophets by the kings in times of extraordinary distress" (Von Gerlach, cf. Numb. xxii. 5; Jerem. xxi. 1). It is very significant of the comparative position of prophets and priests that the latter were chosen as ambassadors to the former. The priests were officers only by virtue of their birth. The prophets were chosen men of God, filled with His Spirit. "Isaiah was the only one to whom the nation could turn under the circumstances, the one to whom it must turn. From the point of time referred to in Isai. vii. 3 sq. he presided over this work of divine discipline" (Drechsler). Thenius' remark: "This official embassy was intended to encourage the people," is an error. It was not sent with any politic intention at all, but sprang from the need of reliable counsel in a desperate situation. Hezekiah desired first of all to know God's will. He therefore sent to the approved and highly honored prophet.—A day of distress, &c., ver. 3. Luther incorrectly, following the Vulg. (et incropanationis et blasphemiae): und des Scheltens und Lästerens [E. V. of rebuke and blasphemy].

חִקְוֹנָה means chastisement, punishment (Hos. v. 9;

Ps. cxlix. 7). נִקְוָה means disdain, abhorrence, especially of the people by God (Deut. xxxii. 19; Lament. ii. 6). [The meaning here is that it is a day on which God has disdainfully rejected his people, and left them to their enemies.—W. G. S.]—For the children are come to the opening of the womb, &c. The proverb is taken from the crisis in child-bearing, where the child is in the midst of the birth, but the strength of the mother fails on account of the continuous pains, so that she and the child are both in danger. Clericus, therefore, interprets it of the situation of those in great peril, who know what they must do in order to escape, but who feel that it is beyond their power to take the necessary measures, and who fear that, if they should make the attempt, all would be lost.—וְאֵין, ver. 4, non est dubitantis particula, sed bene sperantis (Clericus). He hopes that God will not allow the words which have been spoken to go unnoticed. The Lord thy God, inasmuch as the prophet is in an especial sense His servant. The remnant are those who, like Jerusalem, were not yet in the power of the Assyrians, who had already overrun the country and captured the strongholds.

Ver. 6. And Isaiah said unto them, &c. The prophet does not call the officers of the king עֲבָדֵי, but נָעָרִים. He does not thereby simply designate them as "servants," or, in fact, "body-servants," as Thenius insists. There is rather a contemptuous significance in the word, which is never used of old men, such as these officers were.

Knobel: "The youths, the youngsters." Ewald and Umbreit even render it: "The boys"; Drechsler: "The guards, the rank and file, who have no discretionary judgment." [Herein lies the contumely of the epithet. These high officers are called by a name applicable only to those who have nothing to do but mechanically obey orders. It is like calling cabinet ministers, who are, in a good sense, "servants" of the State, public lackeys.—W. G. S.]—I will inspire him with such a spirit, &c., ver. 7. Malvenda's rendering: Veniet per aërem nuncius seu rumor, is entirely erroneous. "Others understand by 'spirit' here, a wind, especially a noxious wind, the Simoom, or something of that kind, which can sweep away a whole army, and which the angel (ver. 35) may have used as an instrumentality" (Richter). That, however, is not the meaning. רִיחַ is often used for disposition, state of mind. (Knobel: I will awaken in him such a state of mind. Thenius: a despondent disposition or mood. Similarly Theodoret: πνεῦμα, ῥῆν δειλίαν οἰμαὶ ὀλησθῆναι). Here it evidently means more than that, and refers to the "extraordinary impulsion of a divine inspiration which is to hurry him blindly on" (Drechsler). This spirit is to leave him, no rest, so that, as soon as a certain rumor reaches his ears, he shall hurry away. The sense is, therefore: I will bring it about that he shall feel himself powerfully impelled to retreat. The "rumor" which he is to hear is not the news of the defeat of his army (Lightfoot, Thenius), for he was with his army in person, but the news of Tirhakah's approach (ver. 9). This news was the first and immediate occasion of his retreat. The destruction of his army was then added, and this hastened his steps. The prophet does not, therefore, refer expressly to the latter. Drechsler finds in this a kind of "pedagogic wisdom, for thus he forced Hezekiah and the people to put implicit faith in the word of God upon which they had to rely."—And I will cause him to fall by the sword in his own land. The assertion that this declaration is put in the mouth of Isaiah by the historian, post eventum, is both arbitrary and violent. It appears also in the other narrative, Isaiah xxxvii. 7, in the same words. It therefore belongs to the common source of both, which Isaiah himself wrote.

Ver. 8. So Rab-shakeh returned. He did not, therefore, forthwith commence the siege, although he had come to Jerusalem with a large force (chap. xviii. 17), but first reported to his master that he had accomplished nothing by his speeches, and had found Jerusalem strongly fortified. He found Sennacherib making war before Libnah. In regard to this city, see note on chap. viii. 22. It lay some distance north [north-west] of Lachish, about as far from it as from Jerusalem, which lay to the northeast of both. [The position is uncertain. On the authority of Eusebius, Gesenius, Thenius, and Keil place it in the neighborhood of Eleutheropolis or Beit Jibrin. Lenormant puts Libnah on his map S. E. of Lachish.] It follows that Sennacherib had not, in the mean time, advanced southwards, towards Egypt, but northwards, that is, he had retreated. This he had done, no doubt, on account of Tirhakah's advance. It can hardly be, as Keil and Thenius suppose, that he had taken Lachish, for; if he had done so, he would probably have remained in that place, and not have retreated. Lachish appears to have been so strong by nature that he could not take it at once, and therefore desired to get possession of Libnah at least. He heard the news of Tirhakah's advance, not at Libnah, but while he was besieging Lachish. In the first place he passed by Jerusalem, but it was now of the utmost importance to him to get possession of this strong position, so as not to have it in his rear. [On this point also see the Supplementary Note.]—Tirhakah, who is called by Manetho, Tapakhō, by Strabo, Τάρακω δ Αἰθιοψ, on Egyptian monuments Tahrka or Taharka, "is represented on the Pylon of the great temple of Medinet-Abu in the guise of a king, who is slaughtering, before the god Ammon, enemies from the conquered countries, Egypt, Syria, and Tepopa (a country which cannot be identified)" (Keil). When, and how long, he ruled over Egypt, are questions which do not here concern us further. (See Niebuhr, Gesch. Assy., s. 72 and 458). He is described, like Sesostriis, as one of the great conquerors of the ancient world (Strabo l. 45). This was the ground for the effect which his approach produced.

Ver. 9. He sent messengers again unto Hezekiah. Instead of חֲשִׁיבֵנוּ we find in Isai.

xxxvii. 9 חֲשִׁיבֵנוּ. Drechsler thinks that this word is much more forcible, and that it is repeated from the beginning of the verse, in order to show that Sennacherib sent the messengers as soon as he heard the news. The text before us, however, seems to be the better one, as Delitsch also admits in this case. The point to be emphasized is, not that Sennacherib sent at once upon hearing this news, but that he sent again, made another attempt to get possession of Jerusalem by capitulation, without drawing the sword, for Jerusalem was far stronger than Samaria, and the latter cost Shalmaneser a three years' siege.—On ver. 10 see chap. xviii. 30, and on ver. 11 cf. the similar piece of boasting, Isai x. 8–11. This time Sennacherib addresses himself directly to Hezekiah by a letter, and hopes for better success than was won by his servants. The letter contains the same arguments as Rab-shakeh's speech, with this difference, that still more countries which had been conquered by the Assyrian arms are here enumerated, in order to heighten the effect. לְהַחֲרִיבֵם (ver. 11), not: in order to destroy them, but; so that they destroyed, or: by this, that they destroyed them; strictly: by devoting them to destruction. Cf. Deut. ii. 34; iii. 6; Josh. viii. 26; 1 Sam. xv. 3, 8; Numb. xxi. 3.—In ver. 12 the countries which Rab-shakeh had not mentioned are mentioned first, and then, in ver. 13, those which he had mentioned. On Gozan see note on chap. xvii. 6. The mention of this place in connection with Haran in Mesopotamia (Gen. xi. 31) does not force us to conclude that it refers to Gauzanitis in that country. "The enumeration is founded on historical, not on geographical facts" (Keil). Rezepth was a place in the district of Palmyra, in eastern Syria, which Ptolemy calls (5,15)

Ῥοδόφα. It was a day's journey west of the Euphrates (Winer, R.-W.-B.). Jalkuti mentions nine cities of this name in his geographical dictionary. The one here referred to was probably the most important amongst them. Eden is certainly not the Syrian Eden (Amos i. 5), for the reference here is to Assyrian conquests; but is the Eden mentioned in connection with Canneh and Haran, in Ezek. xxvii. 23. It must, therefore, be sought in Mesopotamia. It is quite uncertain where Thelassar was, and whether it was a city or a district. Perhaps it was in Mesopotamia, like the other places here mentioned, or perhaps it was in Babylon, for לְהַל (hill) occurs at the first part of many Babylonian geographical names. Ewald considers it identical with Theleda, near Palmyra. According to Delitsch, it is "Thelser of the Tab. Peusing, on the east side of the Tigris." The children of Eden "may have been a tribe which had just then acquired importance, had established itself in Thelassar, a place which did not originally belong to it, and had founded a kingdom there, as the Chaldeans did in Babylon" (Drechsler).—On ver. 13 see notes on chap. xvii. 24 and xviii. 34.

Ver. 14. And Hezekiah received the letter. The plural, סְפָרִים, has here a singular signification; litera, epistola, as the suffix in מִסְפָּרֵי shows. Hezekiah went into the temple to pray, after the receipt of Sennacherib's letter, as he had done after Rab-shakeh's speech (ver. 1). He spread it before the Lord, as it were before the throne of Jehovah. It is incomprehensible that Gesenius should have asserted that Hezekiah did this with the same motive with which the Thibetans set up their prayer-machines before their gods, in order that the gods may read the prayers for themselves. The substance of the prayer itself (ver. 15–19) contradicts any such notion most distinctly, for the conception of the one sole God of heaven and earth, as opposed to all heathen conceptions of divinity, which here appears, excludes totally any such coarse anthropomorphic fantasy. It is impossible to impute any such gross superstition to that king of Israel, who displayed zeal against idolatry such as no king since David had shown, and who stood in such relation as we have seen to Isaiah, the most gifted of the prophets. Nor can we explain to ourselves Hezekiah's action in spreading the letter before God, with Keil and Von Gerlach, as "child-like faith and confidence," for it would have been more than "childish" if Hezekiah had believed that this letter must be presented to God for Him to see and read it Himself. Still less can we suppose that his object was ut populum earum literarum conspectu ad deum orandum excitaret (Clericus). It was rather a significant, or symbolic, act. Hezekiah solemnly hands over the letter, the documentary blasphemy, to Jehovah. He spreads it before Jehovah and leaves to Him the work of punishing it. Lisso: "The act of spreading out the letter before Jehovah is a symbolic presentation of the great distress into which he has been brought by Sennacherib, and to which his prayer refers." Delitsch: "It is a prayer without words, a prayer in action, which then passes into a spoken prayer." He calls upon Jehovah as the God of Israel, i. e., as the one who has chosen Israel out of all the nations of the earth to be His own people, and has made a covenant with this nation, and who, therefore, sits between the cherubim, and dwells amongst His chosen people (see the dissertation on the Significance of the Temple under 1 Kings vi., § 6, c and d), is not, however, a mere national divinity like the gods of the nations which the Assyrians had conquered, as Sennacherib supposed, but is the One, Almighty Creator of heaven and earth. In Isai. xxxvii. 16 we find with יהוה the word צְבָאוֹת, παντοκράτωρ (2 Sam. v. 10; vii. 8). This would hardly have been left out if the author had found it in the original document which served as his authority. "יהוה" in צְבָאוֹת is an emphatic repetition, and so a reinforcement, of the subject, as in Isai. xliii. 25; li. 12, &c.; tu ille (not, tu es ille), that is, tu, nullus alius" (Delitsch).

Ver. 16. Lord, bow down thine ear. Drechsler: "This express mention of the two chief senses, the development of each of the two chief ideas, according to their details, into a twofold prayer, the complete symmetry of the two clauses of the sentence, the repetition of יהוה in the second clause

—all these conspire to give to the prayer the greatest urgency and emphasis." The singular, "thine ear," with the plural, "thine eyes," is a standing formula (Ps. xvii. 6; xxxi. 2, &c.). "When we wish to hear, we bend down one ear to the speaker; when we wish to see, we open both eyes" (Gesenius). That "open thine eyes" does not mean: "Read the letter" (Knobel) is evident from Isai. i. 15, where the reference is not to a letter at all, but only to a prayer. The second "hear" is equivalent to "notice," "pay heed to." [The anthropomorphism is plain. The explicit mention of the senses in addressing God is intended to express the most urgent prayer for attention.—W. G. S.]—In ver. 17 Hezekiah admits the truth of what Sennacherib had boasted of, namely, the subjugation of all those peoples and countries. By the following words he means to say: This was possible for him because they had no protection and no help in their gods of wood and stone; but thou, O Jehovah! our God, art the only God, the Almighty One, Who canst help. Help then thy people for thine own glory, that all nations may know Thee as the One True God (ver. 19). יהוה does not mean: to put to death by the sword (Luther), but: to devastate, to destroy. Ezek. xix. 7; Judges xvi. 24. Instead of the nations and their lands, Isaiah xxxvii. 18 reads: "all the lands and their (own) land." [E. V. (as an escape from the difficulty) "all the nations and their lands."] The reading of Isaiah is not to be preferred "on account of its greater difficulty" (Keil, Drechsler). On the contrary, the text of Kings seems to be more correct, as the majority of the commentators admit. Thenius goes so far as to say that the text of Isaiah must be "totally rejected." The explanation that the Assyrians had, in consequence of their numberless wars, devastated their own country, is altogether too forced. It does not fit the context, for, if it were adopted, then "their gods" in ver. 18 might refer to the gods of the Assyrians. Neither does גִּתְּוֹן, in Isaiah, deserve to be preferred, as the more difficult reading, to the גִּתְּוֹן of the text before us. Knobel gives an incorrect interpretation of the words: And have cast their gods into the fire. Hezekiah does not mean "to put their godliness in its proper light," and to say: "They acted wickedly even from their own stand-point, since they held these idols to be gods, and nevertheless destroyed them." Drechsler's remark is more correct: "Standing themselves in the midst of the heathen modes of thought, and moving with the mythologic tendency which was in the process of development, they recognized the deep connection between the religion of a people, its national cultus, and its identity as a particular individual in the family of nations. It was a result of this fundamental conception that the idols of conquered peoples were often carried into captivity." [That is, the whole nationality was taken captive, reduced to submission, and carried away by the victor, root and branch.—Hezekiah's mention of the destruction of the heathen gods (idols), in his prayer, therefore, belongs to his description of the completeness of the Assyrian victory, and the utter extirpation of the nationalities which they had conquered.—W. G. S.] Thenius refers, in his comment on this passage, to Botta, Monum. pl. 140, "where an idol is being hewn in pieces while the booty from a conquered city is being carried out and weighed."—Therefore they have destroyed them. They were easily able to do so, he means to say, because these were gods made by men's hands out of wood and stone. "It will, however, and it must, be entirely different, if he now proceeds to assail Jehovah" (Drechsler). (The connection of thought may be thus developed: His boast is true. He has indeed uprooted the nations, devastated their countries, and destroyed their idols, in whom they trusted for protection. The inference he desires us to draw is, that Jehovah, our God, in whom we trust, will not be able to save us, any more than these gods to save their worshippers. But what is the assumption on which this inference entirely depends? It is that Jehovah is only another god like those. But they are only pieces of wood and stone, while Jehovah is the sole and almighty God of hosts. Hence the assumption is false, the inference falls to the ground with it, and the boast, although it is true, is idle.—W. G. S.)

Ver. 20. Then Isaiah . . . sent to Hezekiah, &c. He did not probably send the following answer by a "younger prophet," or "prophet-disciple" (chap. ix. 1) (Knobel), but by the same embassy which Hezekiah, who in the mean time had gone into the temple, had sent to him. The reply was not written (Starke), it was delivered orally, but it is certain that it was recorded by Isaiah.—She despises thee, &c. ver. 21. The entire passage vers. 21–34 may be divided into three parts. In the first, vers. 21–28, the haughty Assyrian himself is addressed. It consists of words especially adapted to scorn his pretensions. In the second, vers. 29–31, the prophet addresses himself directly to Hezekiah. In the third, vers. 32–34, the catastrophe of the Assyrian enterprise is solemnly foretold. The commencement of the oracle constitutes, in form and contents, the strongest and most confident contrast to the Assyrian haughtiness. [This division is correct for the sense of the passage. According to its poetic construction, however, it is rather composed of four strophes, two of four and two of three verses. The oracle is highly finished both in its poetic construction, and in the flow of thought. It commences with an indignant and scornful outburst of utter contempt for the Assyrian pretensions (first str.); it then proceeds to refute them by calmer reasoning (sec. str.); then it turns to Hezekiah and Judah, the other parties to the dispute, with encouragement (third str.); and finally it gives, with quiet confidence, a declaration as to the solution of the crisis (fourth str.).—W. G. S.]—The virgin daughter, only expresses the relation of apposition. "Daughter" is the ordinary figure under which lands and cities are designated (Isai. xxiii. 12; xlvii. 1; Jerem. xlii. 11; Lament. i. 15). "Virgin" is used of a city which is as yet unconquered (see Gesenius on Isai. xxiii. 12). Here it is prefixed by way of emphasis, and expresses "in contradiction to the confidence of the Assyrian, the consciousness of impregnability" (Drechsler). At thee, lit. after thee or behind thee. "This is a picturesque feature in the description, and is, therefore, mentioned first (Hebrew text). Behind thee, as thou departest in shame and disgrace" (Drechsler). She wags her head, not moving it from side to side as a sign of refusal or disapproval, but up and down, as a sign of ridicule, Pa. xxi. 7; cix. 26; Job xvi. 4; Jerem. xviii. 16. She shows "by this gesture that it must have turned out so and not otherwise" (Delitsch). This scorn and ridicule is well deserved, because Sennacherib had blasphemed the Most High, therefore, ver. 22: Whom hast thou insulted and blasphemed? He that sitteth upon the heavens shall laugh.—Lifted voice, not in the sense of shouting aloud (Drechsler, Keil) (for Rab-shakeh was the only one who had lifted up his voice in this sense, not Sennacherib), but in the more general sense of uttering words against anybody [a poetic expression for speaking]. מִן עֵינָיו is not the "height of thine eyes" (Umbreit), but on high, upwards towards heaven; cf. Isai. lvii. 15, "I dwell in the high and holy place." It does not, therefore, simply mean, as in Isai. xl. 26, to look up towards heaven, but, as is seen by the following words: "Against the Holy One of Israel," it has an accessory reference to that pride and arrogance, which places itself on a level with Him who dwells in heaven. The Holy One of Israel is, it is true, the name which is peculiar to Isaiah, but here it is used because "Jehovah is especially designated by the title which distinctly implies that His majesty cannot be outraged by anybody with impunity, Isai. v. 16" (Drechsler). The Sept. and Vulg. [and E. V.] translate, in violation of the masoretic accents: "Against whom hast thou lifted up thy voice, and lifted up thine eyes on high? Against the Holy One of Israel!"

Zion: not of Zion. Even the stat. const., בְּתוּלַת,

Ver. 23. By thy messengers thou hast insulted the Lord. The "messengers" are those mentioned in ver. 9. In Isai. xxxvii. 24 we find instead: "thy servants," evidently referring to those mentioned in chap. xviii. 17. The speech which the prophet here puts in the mouth of Sennacherib, and in which he gives the key to all the feelings and disposition of the latter, is divided into two parts by the emphasized מִן in vers. 23 and 24. Then each principal clause is subdivided. The Sept., Vulg., Luther, and others take all the verbs in both verses as perfect tenses, but it is incorrect because the perfect עָלִיתִי

ver. 23, is followed by the two futures אֶכְרֹת and אֶבְרֹתָ, and likewise the perfect קָרָתִי, ver. 24, by אֶחְרֹתֶיךָ. It is still less admissible to refer ver. 23 to past time and ver. 24 to future time, and to translate the perfect עָלִיתִי as a perfect, but the perfect קָרָתִי as an imperfect, as is often done.

The rule which here applies is the one given by Gesenius (Hebr. Gramm. § 126, 4): "The perfect may even refer to the future, especially in strong affirmations and assurances, in which the speaker regards the matter, in his own will, as already done, or as good as accomplished. In German [and English] the present is used in such cases instead of the future" (cf. Ewald, Lehrb. § 135, c). This use is common in prophecies, Isai. ix. 1; v. 13. Of Pa. xxxi. 6; Gen. xv. 18; xvii. 20. We therefore translate, with De Wette, Hitzig, Knobel, Umbreit, Ewald, and others, both perfects by the present, especially as it could not, in any sense, be said of Sennacherib that he had already dried up all the rivers of Egypt. Sennacherib boasts not so much of what he has done as of what he can do; he represents himself as almighty. Yet it is true that "in each of the two verses, the second clause gives the consequence of the first, that is to say, the second clause tells, in each case, what the Assyrian proposes to do after he has accomplished what is mentioned in the first clause" (Keil). Drechsler's objection that this makes the Assyrian appear as an "empty boaster," who, "in ridiculous hyperboles piles up a catalogue of things which he boastfully intends to do," has no weight, for it is not the prophet's intention to mention all the great things which the Assyrian has already done, but to show what he imagines that he can do. He does not mean to make him enumerate the great deeds which he has accomplished, but he means to describe his disposition, the thoughts of his heart.—This answers the question whether the words which are here put into the mouth of Sennacherib are to be taken literally (historically) or figuratively. Many of the old commentators thought that they were literal and historical. Drechsler adopts this view. He says: "The greater the deeds were which he boasted of, the more necessary it was, if he did not wish to produce an entirely contrary effect from the one which the words seem to indicate, that there should be earnest facts behind his words, and that they should rest upon incidents which could not be denied, but were notorious." Keil justly objects that there is not the slightest reason to believe that Sennacherib, or any of his predecessors, ever crossed Mt. Lebanon, with all his chariots and military force, and conquered Egypt, or dried up its rivers. Umbreit also says: "We do not see what the cutting down of the cedars and cypresses signifies, under this interpretation." "Nevertheless, the speech, although it is here given in a rhetorical and poetical form, is not mere poetry. The figures used rest upon actual circumstances, and the speech is not exhausted if we simply interpret it to mean: There exists no effectual hindrance to my power, neither heights nor depths, neither mountains with impenetrable forests, nor plains which are barren and waterless, or cut up by rivers. On the contrary, ver. 23 refers directly to Palestine, and ver.

24 to Egypt. Lebanon is the mountain which forms the northern boundary of Palestine. It shuts it in and forms the gateway to it (cf. Zach. xi. 1, Cocceius: Libanon munimentum terræ Canaan versus septentrionem est). When an enemy has passed over it and occupied it, the whole land lies open before him; it is in his power. Just as the word "gate" is made to cover that to which the gate leads, so Lebanon here stands for the whole country to which it is the key (Isai. xxxiii. 9; xxxv. 2). [There is no instance of this use of language. Lebanon is often spoken of as one of the glories of the country; never as standing for, covering, or representing the country. The two instances quoted belong to the former usage. In Isai. xxxiii. 9, Lebanon is mentioned with Sharon and Bashan, the other especial sources of pride to the country, as lying waste. In xxxv. 2, among the details of the future glory which was to be enjoyed, Lebanon is mentioned to say that it shall recover its former grandeur. In neither case does it, in any sense, stand for the land of Canaan.—W. G. S.] As in the north Canaan was shut in by Lebanon, so it was enclosed and protected on the south by the waterless desert of Beersheba (Gen. xxi. 14), which is contiguous to the desert El Thā (Herodotus iii. 8, Robinson, Palestine I, 300). Beyond are the rivers, the arms of the Nile which protect Egypt. These two great hindrances, the mountain on the north, and the desert and then the rivers on the south, the haughty king declares to be insignificant. He can pass over Lebanon even with his chariots, and can dry up the rivers of Egypt with the soles of his feet. But all this even does not exhaust the meaning of this speech. If, namely, ver. 23 only meant to say: The highest mountain in the country is no hindrance for me, then we could not see what was the significance of the following words: And I will hew down its loftiest cedars and its choicest cypresses. It cannot refer to any actual cutting down of these trees, since Sennacherib had no reason for devastating Lebanon, or for wanting cedar or cypress wood. Moreover the cedars and cypresses were no particular hindrance to him. We have here another instance of the figure which occurs in Jerem. xxii. 6, 7, 23; Ezek. xvii. 3, only somewhat further elaborated. Lebanon is the kingdom of Judah, its summit is Jerusalem, the city of David and Mount Zion. Its cedars and cypresses are its princes and mighty men, whom Sennacherib thinks that he can "hew down." Its "resting-place" and "forest-grove" are the king's palace on Mount Zion; there he intends to make his encampment (Isai. x. 29.

See Delitsch on Isai. xxxvii. 24). עֵר בְּרִמְלָה is not a designation for the "places on Mount Lebanon which were thickly grown with herbs" (Fürst), but for the forest on its summit, which consisted of beautiful trees forming an orchard-like grove, see Isai. xxix. 17. "The predicate 'garden' is applied to this forest because it consists of choice trees" (Drechsler). [It rather resembles a carefully kept grove or orchard than an untrained forest.—W. G. S.] Both expressions are decisive in favor of the figurative acceptance of the passage, for we cannot suppose that there was a real "inn," or "resting-place," on the summit of Lebanon (Clericus, Vitringa, Rosenmüller); in the first place, because there is no mention of any such thing, and again, because, if there had been, it would not have been of any importance to Sennacherib. Moreover, "Resting-place" [literally "inn"] and "forest-grove" are in apposition, but a forest is not an inn, and can only be called a "resting-place" in so far as it is a shady place fit to rest in, that is, in a figurative sense. There is, however, in both expressions a reference to the "House of the Forest of Lebanon" (1 Kings vii. 2; Isai. xxii. 8), which represented the defensive military force (see 1 Kings vii., Ezrag. on ver. 2, and Hist. § 2), and which resembled a forest on account of its cedar columns. The full sense of ver. 23, therefore, which, because it affected Hezekiah, is more detailed than ver. 24, which refers to Egypt, is this: I am putting an end to the kingdom of Judah with its capital, its citadel, its kings, and its princes, and all its glory.

[The figurative interpretation is adopted by all the commentators of note, but the above special application of the details of the verse to "Mount Zion," the "King's palace," the "House of the Forest of Lebanon," the "Princes and Chief men," &c., &c., suffers from the weakness which is inherent in every symbolical interpretation which is not directly suggested in the context. It is evident that the symbolical explanations are forced and far-fetched, and, in the mouth of an Assyrian, inexplicable. Moreover, a careful examination of the other cases where Lebanon is used in a metaphor (Isai. xxxiii. 9; xxxv. 2; xxii. 6, 7, 23; Ezek. xvii. 3; Hab. ii. 17) shows that they differ essentially from this one. The simile is always formally introduced as such, and there is no evidence of any usage of language by which Lebanon was made to stand for the whole country as, for instance, "Jerusalem" or "Mount Zion" were used for the whole nation. The details given in verse 23 form an exact description of the march of an army over Lebanon. Let us suppose for a moment that Sennacherib had actually entered Palestine from the north by passing over the mountain. He then boasts that by or with the whole host of his chariots, usually supposed to be fit only for travelling over a plain, he has even gone up to the top of the mountain; that he there cut down the largest and strongest trees (cypresses and cedars being the principal trees on Lebanon), in order to make a way for his army—these mighty trees, the pride of the mountain, making it difficult for an army to march through and preserve its order, had not availed to hinder him. He had hewn them down and cast them away. He had found a resting-place and encamped his army on the very summit of the mountain, in its choicest and most beautiful forest, which had proved for him a shelter and resting-place, not a hindrance. If we thus suppose that, as a fact, he had accomplished this difficult military feat, it is seen that the details of this boast, which is put into his mouth, fit well into the actual details of such an undertaking. We will not infer that he had accomplished this feat, since no hint of it occurs anywhere, but the accuracy of the details is very remarkable. Ver. 24, on the other hand, is brief, and purely poetical. What are we to understand by parching up rivers with the soles of one's feet? This rather corresponds to the nature of a bold enterprise, as yet unaccomplished, than to the actual details of a feat already performed. The attempt to specify in detail the things referred to by the separate objects in a bold poetic image or reference of this kind is always a failure. It only sketches in bold outline the thoughts, ambitions, and intentions of Sennacherib, being based possibly on actual deeds which he had accomplished, and in this form it must be left. It is not a parable, but a poetic and boastful statement, in huge outline, of what was in his mind. Whether, as an actual fact, he had led his army over Lebanon or not, he makes use of such a feat as a general specimen of the kind of things he was capable of accomplishing. If he had not done something of that kind, Drechsler's objection would have great force, that his boast would be ridiculous. That "Lebanon" figures in this speech may be merely owing to the fact that a Jewish prophet puts it into the mouth of the Assyrian, and Sennacherib may somewhere else have passed with his army over a mountain which was supposed to be impassable. In short, then, it is a boast, founded probably on some feat which the Assyrians had accomplished, calling up in vivid figures their power to overcome hindrances supposed to be insurmountable, and setting forth the arrogance which these successes had inspired in them, which led them to think that no obstacles could stay them. Having passed mountains, they were ready to believe that they could parch up rivers. Then follows the rebuke that they had had all these successes only because they were fore-ordained instruments of God's Providence, but that, when they had reached the limit of what he intended them to do, they could go no farther, and moreover that their arrogance in ascribing their success to their own power would call for punishment from Him.—W. G. S.]

In regard to the detailed exegesis we have yet to notice בְּרֶכֶב רָכְבִּי, literally: "With chariot of my chariots," i. e., with my numberless chariots (cf. Nahum iii. 17, גִּבּוֹר גִּבּוֹרֵי). According to Keil this is "more original;" according to Knobel it is "more choice, more difficult, and therefore preferable" to בְּרֶכֶב רָכְבִּי, "with the multitude of my chariots," which we find in Isai. xxxvii. 24, and which the keri, many codices, and all the ancient versions have in this place. We agree with Thenius in preferring the latter reading as the more natural one. The sense is the same in either case. Ewald translates: "By the simple march of my chariots," but the point of importance here is not the uninterrupted onward march, but that chariots, which generally are only fit for level ground, are said to have passed over the highest mountains. Its summit, יְרֵכְתִּי (cf. Jer. vi. 22, where the Sept. has ἀπ' ἐσχάτου), literally, its outmost limit or boundary, Vulg. summitas. קָלָן is decidedly to be preferred to קָרוֹן, height (Isai. xxxvii. 24), for it is far more significant, and the idea of "height" is already expressed in יְרֵכְתִּי.—I dig and drink, ver. 24. Ver. 23 refers to the subjugation of Palestine; ver. 24 to that of Egypt. The digging does not refer to "the rigdigging of the wells and cisterns which had been filled up by the fleeing enemy" (Thenius), but to the work which is necessary to find water for a great army in a district where it is wanting. "Strange water" is "water which is not sprung from the soil of this nation" (Drechsler), not, water which belongs to others (Clericus: in alieno solo, quasi in meo, fodiam puteos). וְ is used as in Isai. xvii. 10. The word is wanting in the text of the parallel passage of Isaiah, but it is very forcible. [This interpretation is not clear. It must mean either that Sennacherib's army carried with it water from Assyria, which is not conceivable unless possibly for the king alone, or else, taking the verb as a distinct preterite, that he had drunk the waters of other nations than Judah, viz., of Assyria, and hence his strength. This latter hypothesis would not chime well with the next clause and is not acceptable. Clericus' interpretation is better. The Assyrian boasts that he comes into foreign nations and digs for and drinks the water of their soil—makes use of their resources.—W. G. S.] On the other hand, where there is a superabundance of water, as in Egypt, where the rivers assure the inhabitants an abundant supply, and, at the same time, form barriers to an invader (Nile and its arms, see Winer, R.-W.-B., I. s. 25), there he parches it up. With the sole of my foot, a strong hyperbole. It does not mean "under the footsteps of my countless army" (Knobel). [It seems to be a purely imaginative and poetic idea, with which no literal, corresponding, fact can be associated. It could only be applied to a deity, and then only by a poetic image, if the river should disappear by some extraordinary interposition. The king, in his self-assumption, asserts that he will, by some similar god-like power, which is not probably defined as to its mode of operation, even in his own mind, dispose of this hindrance when he meets it.—W. G. S.] קְצוֹר is the poetic name for Egypt. [קְצוֹר, "the 'land of distress' (Angst-land), is a poetic metamorphosis of the Hebrew name of Egypt," קְצוֹרִים, "cf. chap. xix. 6; Mi-

cah vii. 12" (Ewald).] אֶרְצִים are the arms and canals of the Nile; Isai. xix. 6 compared with vii. 18; Ezek. xxix. 3; xxx. 12; Micah vii. 12. In like manner Claudian (De Bello Goth., V. 526) represents Alarich as boasting: Cum cesserit omnis Obsequis natura meis? subidere nostris. Sub pedibus montes, arescere vidimus amnes. Drechsler thinks that "the historical acceptance of ver. 24 cannot be refuted," but the notion of drying up the Nile with the soles of the feet is certainly figurative. [Ver. 24 certainly cannot be understood literally or historically, see above.] The Nile and its branches are to Egypt what the Lebanon and its cedars were to Palestine, viz., the fortification and protection of the country. Sennacherib exalts himself above both as if he were almighty: Where there is no water, there I know how to bring it out of the earth, and where a mass of water lies in my way, I can dry it up.

Ver. 25. Hast thou not heard? Jehovah now answers Sennacherib's insolent and arrogant boast (ver. 23 and 24) by a question, the form of which assumes that he must give an affirmative reply, as the most lively and sharpest form of rebuke (see the questions in Job xxxviii.): Thou speakest as if the greatness of thy might were thy work, and all which thou hast done an achievement of thy power. Know that I planned and ordained it thus of old, and that thou hast only executed my decrees, and been an instrument in my hand, cf. Isai. vii. 20; x. 5; vi. 12 sq. The old commentators took "hear" in a literal sense as referring to the wonderful deeds of God in delivering His people out of Egypt and bringing them to

Canaan, which, they think, were well known to Sennacherib; but the following אָמַת, this, shows that that only is meant which had been accomplished by the Assyrians. Hence others have imagined that there was a reference to prophetic oracles like Isai. vii. 20 sq. which had come to the ears of Sennacherib (cf. Jerem. xl. 1-15), but we may be sure that the prophet did not, in his oracle against the enemy, refer back to that declaration, which was pronounced against Israel. Still less can we agree with Thenius that it refers to an inner hearing of the soul or conscience, or indeed to "Assyrian oracles which were consulted before undertaking the expedition." The question has rather this simple sense: If thou hast never heard it, then hear it now, and know that I planned and determined (literally, fashioned) it so (Isai. xxii. 11). Vitringa: Eventum hunc in omni sua nepotiorum praeformasse in consilio mox providentia. מִיָּמֵי קֶדֶם is used here of time, as in Isai. xxii. 11; מִיָּמֵי קֶדֶם as in Isai. xxiii. 7; Micah vii. 20, "from ancient days." מִיָּמֵי קֶדֶם is generally translated: "That thou mayest be for the destruction." Keil and Drechsler: "That there may be fortified cities for destruction," as in the formula לְבָנֵי עִיר (Isai. v. 5; vi. 13; xlv. 15), i. e., that strong cities may be to be destroyed. [Bähr, in his translation of the text, follows the latter. The former is strictly grammatical and less constrained: Thou art to destroy, i. e., this is thy destiny, thou art an instrument for this work.—W. G. S.]—Ver. 26 is closely connected with ver. 25. That the inhabitants fell down so powerless (literally: were short of hand, i. e., powerless, Numb. xi. 23; Isai. l. 2), and made no resistance, was not the work of the Assyrians, but was foreordained by God. The same images are used for sudden decay of power in Ps. xxxvii. 2; Isai. xl. 6. This series of metaphors forms a climax. The grass upon the roof is that which fades more quickly than that of the field, because it lacks soil (Ps. cxxix. 6). The corn blasted in the germ is the corn which is blighted and withers away before the blade springs, so that at the very outset it has the germ of decay in itself. שָׂרֶפֶת is much to be preferred to the less definite and more general שָׂרָפָה, ground (Isai. xxxvii. 27).—Resting in peace, going out, and coming in (ver. 27) cover all the activity of a man (Ps. cxxi. 8; Deut. xxviii. 6; Ps. cxxxix. 2). [See note 12 under Grammatical.]—Violent hate, Vitringa: Commotio furiunda, quæ ex ira nascitur superbia mixta (Isai. xxviii. 21). Arrogance, which comes from the feeling of security, Amos vi. 1; Ps. cxxxiii. 4. The first figure in ver. 28 is taken from the taming of wild animals, the second from the controlling of restive horses (Ezek. xix. 4; xxix. 4; Isai. xxx. 28; Ps. xxxii. 9). There are two sculptures at Khorsabad which represent "a victorious king leading captives, who stand before him, by a rope and a ring fastened in their lips" (Thenius). Dignum superbo supplicium, ut qui se supra hominem esse putat, ad morem bruti abiciatur (Sanctius). By the way by which thou camest, i. e., with this purpose unaccomplished, without having reached thine object.

Ver. 29. And this be the sign to thee. With these words now, the prophet turns to Hezekiah.

Tibi autem, Ezechia, hoc erit signum (Vulg.). מִיָּמֵי means in general, as Delitsch accurately observes (note on Isai. vii. 11), "a thing, an event, or an action, which is intended to serve as a pledge or proof of the divine certainty of another. Sometimes it is a miracle, openly performed, striking the senses (Gen. iv. 8 sq.), sometimes it is a permanent symbol of what is to come (Isai. viii. 18; xx. 3), sometimes it consists in a prophecy of future events, which, whether they are natural or miraculous, are not to be foreseen by human wisdom, and therefore, when they occur, either reflect backwards in proof of their own divine origin (Exod. iii. 12), or furnish evidence of the divine certainty of others yet to come (Isai. xxxvii. 30; Jerem. xlv. 29 sq.)." In the case before us the sign is no miracle (מִוִּפְתִּי, 1 Kings xiii. 3), but a natural event which serves to give assurance of the truth of a prophecy (Keil). This sign is taken from agriculture, "since this was, at that time, the most important interest of the people, and their attention might be expected for a sign which took this form"

(Knobel). In the following declaration מִיָּמֵי stands first with emphasis, an infinitive absolute, which "can stand concisely and emphatically for any tense or person of the verb which the context demands" (Gesenius, Gramm. § 131, 4 b.). It is often understood here as an imperfect: One shall eat, i. e., people shall eat, or, ye shall eat (Drechsler, Keil, and others); or, as a present; One eats, i. e. Ye are eating (Umbreit, Delitsch, and others), and הַשָּׁנָה is then translated, "this current year."

But we have here three years mentioned, of which the third is the first, which shall be a complete harvest-year, viz., on account of the withdrawal of the Assyrians, who shall leave the land which they have occupied once more free. Ver. 35 shows distinctly that the Assyrian army perished before the third year after the prophet's declaration, and Sennacherib's retreat therefore followed before the third year. Observe especially, in ver. 35, the words: "that night." (See notes below on these words.) Sennacherib, when he heard of Tirhaka's advance, had withdrawn from Lachish to Libnah. From there he once more threateningly demanded the surrender of Jerusalem (vers. 8-10). How can we now understand that, from this point on, he remained in Palestine yet three years, without really laying siege to the city which he had so earnestly threatened? We are, therefore, compelled to take this inf. abs. in the sense of a perfect: edistis (Maurer, Gesenius, Thenius. Cf. Ewald, Lehrb. § 240, a.; 302, c.). [Sixth Ed. In the seventh Ed. the subject is otherwise treated, and the inf. abs. is not represented as standing for any finite form, but as a pure and indefinite expression of the verbal notion, without giving it limitations of time or person. This is unquestionably correct. See § 328, b.—W. G. S.] הַשָּׁנָה, in contrast with "the second" and "the third" year, cannot, of course, refer to anything else than the year which precedes them, that is, the first one. In this first year the Assyrians had invaded the country, and had prevented the people from raising crops. In the second year they were still there, and the crops failed because they had devastated the country. In the third year they retired, and therefore the land could be cultivated. In the first year they lived upon רִיבֹב, i. e., upon that which grew up from the leavings of the former crop, Levit. xxv. 5, 11. Vitringa: Ex etymo valet accessorium, quod sponte nascitur post sementem; a sort of after-growth from fruit of the previous crop which was accidentally dropped in gathering in the harvest. In the second year they lived upon עֲרִיבֹב, i. e., "offshoots of the roots, which spring up in the second year after the planting" (Fürst); אֲרוֹפֹבָה (Aquila, Theodoret). "In the fertile parts of Palestine, especially in the plain of Jezreel, on the highlands of Galilee, and elsewhere, the grains and cereals propagate themselves in abundance by the ripe ears whose superabundance no one uses (cf. Schubert, Reise, III. s. 115, 166. Ritter, Erdkunde XVI. s. 283, 482, 693). Strabo (11. p. 502) makes a similar statement in regard to Albania, that the field which has been once sown bears, in many places, a double harvest, sometimes even three, the first one fiftyfold" (Keil on Levit. xxv. 6). And the third year sow, and reap, and plant vineyards, and eat their fruits. "The long series of imperatives makes a strong impression, especially in contrast with the indifference of the infin. absol. in the first hemistich" (Drechsler). This interpretation of the oracle is the only one which gives just force to חֵן. The sign is not something which does not yet exist but is to come; it is something visible, physical, and present, which announces and gives a pledge of something invisible and future. The sense, therefore, is not: Ye shall from this time on, in the present year, eat the chance product of the uncultivated fields, and in the next, the fruit of the offshoots from the roots of the plants, and then, in the third, sow and reap—for that would not be a "sign";—but the sense is: So certainly as ye have lived one year on the chance produce, and one year on after-growth, just so certainly shall ye sow and reap in the third year; that is to say: the land will be delivered from the Assyrians, and free for you to cultivate (cf. Hos. vi. 2). [Clearly this, when it should come to pass, would not be any "sign" that something, viz., the retreat of the Assyrians, should yet come to pass. In the nature of things the Assyrians must depart before the Jews would venture into the fields. We might as well say: The clouds shall be dispelled, and the sign of it shall be that the sun shall shine. The interpretation of the passage given above is correct, but the "sign" cannot be understood to mean that, when this thing should come to pass according to the prophecy, it should be a pledge that another thing, which the prophet had also foretold, should yet come to pass. It can only mean that when the Jews should once more find themselves at work in the fields, where they had not been for two years, this should be a sign, proof, and reminder to them that they had been delivered, by divine interposition, from a great national calamity. It is a sign which is of the nature of a symptom, or index.—W. G. S.] The interpretation which is given by many of the old expositors admits, on account of ver. 35, that the retreat of Sennacherib took place in the year in which the prophet delivered this oracle, but it takes the infinitive אָכַל as an imperative on account of the following imperatives, and then assumes that the "first" year, the one in which Sennacherib retreated, was a Sabbath-year, in which, under any circumstances, according to the Mosaic law, the people neither sowed nor reaped, but lived on the second, spontaneous growth (Levit. xxv. 5), and that a Jubilee-year followed next after this, in which likewise there was no sowing or reaping (Levit. xxv. 11), so that two harvests in succession were passed over. But the simple fact that אָכַל is an infinitive forbids us to take it as an imperative, and, even if we assume that the Sabbath-years and Jubilee-years were, at that time, regularly observed, yet there is no hint in Levit. xxv. that the Jubilee-year followed immediately after a Sabbath-year. But still farther, who can prove, since every hint of it is wanting in the text, that just at that time a Sabbath-year and a Jubilee-year followed successively? Others have, therefore, given up the Jubilee-year and have supposed that only the spontaneous product of the fields was eaten in the first year, because the country had been devastated by the Assyrians, but that the second year was a Sabbath-year. Yet even this cannot be accepted, for the intent of the "sign" is not that they, trusting in Jehovah, should for still another year have food to eat, although they did not sow or reap, but that Sennacherib should retreat, the land should be delivered from him, and that too at once, not after three years. We cannot, therefore, agree with Ewald (Proph. des Alt. Bundes, I. s. 299 sq.), whom Umbreit follows, when he says: "As, after the year in which, according to the Law, the ground lay fallow, yet another year was to be spent without raising crops, in order to restore the land to its original condition, a figure which evidently (?) floated before the mind of the prophet here, so he apprehended (?) that, in this far more important case, still a second year must pass without field-labor, in which they must eat the spontaneous product of the ground, until, after the extirpation of all that was unsound and corrupt in the State, a small company of purified men should commence, in the third year, a new and prosperous existence, and the messianic time should begin, taking its rise in Zion." There is no reference to the Sabbath, or Jubilee, year in the entire passage, and no such reference can ever be established from the mere fact that אָכַל occurs also in Levit. xxv. 5 and 11. Neither can we agree that Drechsler's explanation (s. 184) is "very simple." According to him there was left in Judah at that time only a greatly diminished population, which could not at once undertake the cultivation of the fields, so that it was not until after three years that the regular cultivation of the soil was reestablished. If there was only "a small remnant" of the population remaining, then they did not require much. They could cultivate enough soil to produce what they needed, and did not need to live on אָכַל, much less on עֲרִיבֹב. These interpretations are all more or less forced, and they all fall to the ground as soon as we no longer insist upon taking the infin. absol. אָכַל as an imperfect or an imperative.

Ver. 30. And the remnant of the house of Judah that is left. Starting now from the reference to the growth of the crops, the prophet goes on to matters of higher importance, and takes up that which is the chief theme of his prophecies in all their diverse phases (Schmieder), viz., that God, although he inflicts fierce judgments upon His people for their apostasy, nevertheless will not allow them to perish utterly, but will preserve a remnant which has escaped or been delivered, "a holy seed," and that from the midst of this the Messiah shall at last arise (Isai. vii. 3; x. 20; iv. 2; vi. 13; cf. 1 Kings xix. 18). The repeated expressions פְּלִיָּטָה, נִשְׁאָרָה, and שְׁאֵרִית, in vers. 30 and 31, refer to this idea. The Assyrian invasion, like that of Ephraim and Syria (Isai. vii; 2 Kings xvi. 5), was a divine judgment upon Judah, but the prophet says that the nation shall not perish under it. A remnant (שְׁאֵרִית, ver. 31, refers back to שְׁאֵרִית in Hezekiah's prayer, ver. 4) shall still remain, and it shall add roots (יִסְקָה), that is, it shall go on to develop new roots, and shall win firmer hold (Thenius); cf. Isai. xi. 11; xxvii. 6.—For, from Jerusalem, &c., ver. 31, &c., it is the determination of God, adopted of old, that from Jerusalem, which now is so much distressed and apparently lost, salvation and redemption shall go forth (Isai. ii. 3). Jerusalem and Mt. Zion form the centre of the theocracy, or kingdom of God. "The Assyrian chastisement will, therefore, be a purification of the nation. It will not result in its destruction. That judgment was, therefore, a prototype of all the others which befell the kingdom of God in later times, out of which the election of grace is developed (Rom. xi. 5) in more and more glorious form (Von Gerlach). The only ground for what is said in vers. 29 to 31 is the zeal of Jehovah, i. e., His zealous and faithful love to His people (Zach. i. 14). The same concluding words follow the oracle, Isai. ix. 1-6, and they show that the passage before us is also, at least indirectly, messianic.—Therefore, thus saith the Eternal. הָיָה gathers up the substance of all which precedes. The first of the four members of the verse, He shall not come, contains the principal idea. The three others "are nothing but a development of this one, intended to surround it here, at the close, with all possible emphasis" (Drechsler). At the same time they form a climax: So far from coming into the city, he shall not even discharge his missiles against it, or form an assault against it, or even build up a wall to besiege it. קָרַם in the piel means to advance. "The reference is to an assault with shields held out in front" (Thenius). Cf. Ps. xviii. 5, 18; lix. 10. Instead of יָבֵא בָהּ, in ver. 33, we find in Isai. xxxvii. 34: בָּא בָּהּ, which is unquestionably the correct reading. All the old translations here present the perfect. The other reading seems to have arisen from the second יָבֵא. That which has been already said in vers. 28 and 32 is here repeated in order to emphasize the promise.—For mine own sake, "as Hezekiah had prayed, ver. 20, and for the sake of David, my servant, &c., for the sake of the promise given to David, 2 Sam. vii" (Drechsler), cf. 1 Kings xi. 13; xv. 4.

Ver. 35. And it came to pass that night.

According to Thenius, vers. 35-37 are "evidently borrowed from a different source from that of xviii. 13-xix. 34, and xx. 1-19." In the original document of vers. 35-37 he thinks that the words: "It came to pass in that night," referred to something which had been narrated immediately before and which is not mentioned here. Delitsch also believes that there is a gap between vers. 34 and 35, for, according to ver. 29, there was to be yet a full year of distress between the prophecy and the fulfilment, during which agriculture would be neglected." This consideration loses its force under our interpretation of ver. 29. The narrator undoubtedly means to say in vers. 35-37 that the prophecy which reaches its climax in vers. 32-34, was fulfilled at once, and not after the lapse of years. This point was of especial importance to him, and we have no reason to interpret ver. 35-37 according to ver. 29; rather, on the contrary, ver. 29 according to vers. 35-37. Further, when we consider that both narratives [the one here and that in Isaiah] were constructed independently of one another from the same source (see the Prelim. Remarks), and that in both, vers. 35-37 follow immediately upon ver. 34, we must infer that the same was the case also in their common source. There is, therefore, no room to assume the existence of another source in which that was supplied which is here supposed to be left out.—

The words: הָיָה בַּלַּיְלָה הַהוּא are generally understood in the sense of ea ipsa nocte, i. e., in the night following the day on which Isaiah foretold the retreat of the Assyrians. On the contrary Delitsch thinks that "it can only mean (if, indeed, it is not a mere careless interpolation), illa nocte, referring to ver. 32 sq., (i. e., the night in which the Assyrians set out to besiege Jerusalem)." The Rabbis (Guemara Sanhedr. iii. 26), and Josephus (καὶ τὴν πρώην τῆς πολιορκίας νύκτα) thus understood it. But the text does not anywhere say or imply that Sennacherib had advanced with his whole army from Libnah to Jerusalem, and that he stood before it ready to besiege it. [This is true, but does not meet Delitsch's hypothesis, which is that a year is to elapse before the Assyrian would commence the formal siege of Jerusalem, and that "that night" refers to the first night of this siege. Such an hypothesis removes the difficulty, but does not seem to be a natural interpretation of the words.—W. G. B.] The Vulg. translates: Factum est igitur, in nocte illa venit angelus. Menochius takes this to be emphatic for: in celebri illa nocte, viz., in the one in which the destruction of the Assyrian army took place. It is very noticeable that the words in question are wanting in the narrative in Isaiah, although that account is in other respects here identical with the one in Kings, and that ver. 36 there begins with הָיָה. Also the Sept. version of the verse before us omits הָיָה and reads simply: καὶ ἐγένετο νύκτωρ. Now, although the statement is no thoughtless interpolation, and still less, as Knobel thinks, "manufactured" out of Isai. xvii. 14, yet it would never have been passed over in Isaiah's narrative, if it had been essential, or if the chief emphasis lay upon it. The interpretation ea ipsa nocte does not, therefore, seem to be absolutely necessary. The main point is, what is common to both narratives, that there was no delay in the fulfilment of the prophecy. It was not years—for instance, three years—before it was fulfilled.—The angel of the Lord “is the same one who, as מַלְאָכִי, smote the first-born in Egypt (Ex. xii. 29 compared with vers. 12 and 13), and who inflicted the pestilence after the census under David (2 Sam. xxiv. 15 sq.). The latter passage suggests that the slaughter of the Assyrians was accomplished by a pestilence” (Keil). Josephus (Antiq. x. 1, 5,) declares outright: τοῦ θεοῦ λοιμικὴν ἐκσφάραντος αὐτοῦ τῷ στρατῷ νόσον. The interpretations which assume that there was a battle with Tirhaka, or an earthquake with lightning, or a poisonous simoom, are all untenable. The greatly abbreviated account in Chronicles states, instead of giving the definite number of the slain (185,000), that the angel “cut off all the mighty men of valor and the leaders and captains in the camp of the king of Assyria” (2 Chron. xxxii. 21). This does not mean that “only” those persons were killed (Thenius), but that even these, the real supporters and the flower of the Assyrian power, fell. In the camp. We are not told where this was at that time. It is most natural to suppose that it was where Rab-shakeh found it on his return, viz., before Libnah (ver. 8), whither Sennacherib had retreated from Lachish. It was not, therefore, as has been said, before Jerusalem; neither was it in “the pestilential country of Egypt” (Thenius), for Sennacherib sent the letter to Hezekiah, not from there, but from Libnah (vers. 8–10).—And when they arose early in the morning, &c. The word

בֹּקֶר, which occurs also in Isai. xxxvii. 36, presupposes the previous reference to “that night,” which is not there mentioned. Those who were spared, whose number cannot have been large, arose as usual early in the morning and found corpses everywhere. “If מָוֶת is regarded as an attribute it is very flat and superfluous, but as an apposition it gives emphasis” (Drechsler). It was a cause of great trouble to the old expositors that Sennacherib was not among the slain. It is not necessary to suppose that he chanced just then to be outside the camp. Death of a still harder kind was destined to befall him (see verse 7), but the arrogant man was first to suffer the humiliation that his entire force in which he trusted was to be destroyed, and he was to march home in shame and disgrace (ver. 21). “The heaping up of the verbs: he departed, and went, and returned, expresses the hastiness of his retreat” (Keil). This retreat cannot, therefore, have been delayed until the third year after Isaiah’s prophecy, any more than the pestilence which occasioned it. Sennacherib dwelt in Nineveh. “The object of these words is to emphasize the fact that he did not, from this time forward, undertake any assault upon Judah” (Drechsler). On Nineveh, the capital and residence of the kings of Assyria, see Winer, R. W.-B. II. s. 158 sq. Nisroch is probably the name of the chief Assyrian divinity, which is represented on the Assyrian monuments in human form with double wings and an eagle’s head. See Keil on the place and Müller in Herzog’s Realencyc. X. s. 383. [The rank of Nisroch in the pantheon is not yet determined. He was also called Shalman. He was “king of fluids.” He “presided over the course of human destiny.” Hence marriages were placed under his care (Lenormant).] Adrammelech is the name of a divinity. [See the bracketed note on chap. xvii. 31.] It was a very wide-spread custom that princes bore the names of divinities (Gesenius on Isai. vii. 6). Sharazer is probably also the name of a divinity. It is said to mean “Prince of Fire.” [His full name was Asshur-sarossor = “Asshur protects the king.”] The murder of Sennacherib by his sons is mentioned in Tobias i. 21, and also by Berossus, who, however, only mentions one son (Euseb. Chron. Armen. i. p. 43). The land of Ararat is, according to Jerome on Isai. xxxvii.: Regio in Armenia campestris per quam Araxes fluit. It forms, according to Moses of Chorene, the middle portion of the Armenian high land. Esar-haddon, Ezra iv. 2, called by Josephus Ἀσαράδδωας, is mentioned by Berossus also as the successor of Sennacherib. The questions whether he ruled during his father’s life-time as viceroy of Babylon, and whether Nergilus reigned before him, do not here demand our attention. See Niebuhr, Geschichte Assyriens. s. 361. It is not by any means free from doubt that Sennacherib lived nine years after his retreat before his assassination, as the Assyrian inscriptions are asserted to show. “Accordingly, when Hitzig declares that the mention of Sennacherib’s assassination bears witness against Isaiah’s authorship of this historical passage, he has at least no ground in the chronology for this assertion, for it is more than possible, it is very probable, that Isaiah lived into the reign of Manasseh” (Delitsch). [See the Supplem. Note at the end of this section.]

APPENDIX.—It remains still to consider the oft-debated question, whether and when the expedition of Sennacherib against Egypt took place. It is certain according to ver. 24 that Sennacherib had the intention of marching against Egypt. It is not, however, asserted, in the biblical documents at least, that he ever carried out this intention. On the contrary, Herodotus gives (II. 141) the account which he received from the Egyptian priests, that Sennacherib advanced against Egypt as far as Pelusium, in the days of the Tanitic king Sethon, a priest of Vulcan. (Pelusium is the Π of Ezek. xxx. 15. “It lay at the mouth of the eastern branch of the Nile, twenty stadia from the Mediterranean, in the midst of marshes and morasses. Partly on account of this position and partly on account of its strong walls, it was the key to Egypt, of which every invading army which came from the East must seek to get possession. All the conquerors who invaded Egypt from this side stopped at Pelusium and besieged it.” Winer, R. W.-B. II. s. 469.) They added that, at the prayer of this priest to the God for deliverance out of danger, field-mice (μῖρ ἀρουραίων) came by night and gnawed the quivers, the bows, and the straps of the shields, so that the army whose weapons had thus been made useless, was obliged to flee, and many fell; and that, on this account, there was, in the temple of Vulcan, a stone image of this priest-king, having in the hand a mouse, and bearing the inscription: ἐς ἐπὶ τῆς ὁρεῶν ἐποβήης ἔστω. Josephus (Antiq. x. 1, 1–5), referring expressly to Herodotus, narrates that Sennacherib undertook an expedition against Egypt and Ethiopia, but that διαμαρὼν τῆς ἐπὶ τοῖς Αἰγυπτίων ἐπιβολῆς, he returned leaving his object unaccomplished, because the siege of Pelusium had cost him a great deal of time, and because he had heard that the king of Ethiopia was advancing with a very strong army to the relief of the Egyptians. Furthermore, Josephus adds that the Chaldean historian Berosus also states that Sennacherib πάσῃ ἐπεστρατεύσατο τῇ Ἀσίᾳ καὶ τῇ Αἰγύπτῳ. It can hardly be doubted, therefore, that though the Assyrian army did not dry up the rivers of Egypt (ver. 24), yet it advanced to the frontier. But now we come to the far more difficult question, at what point of time did this take place? The least probable reply is that it fell between vers. 34 and 35 (Sanctius, Knobel), and that the historian gives no account of it after ver. 34, because it did not affect Judah, but simply mentions the destruction of the army in vers. 35 and 36 without mentioning whether it took place in Judah or in Egypt. But it is incredible that Sennacherib, for whom it was of the utmost importance (chap. xviii. 17 sq.; xix. 9, sq.) to get possession of Jerusalem, should have given up the effort to capture it without putting any of his threats into execution, and should have marched on against Egypt, leaving in his rear this city which was favorably disposed towards his enemies (chap. xviii. 21). His backward movement from Lachish to Libnah (ver. 8) shows that he was no longer pursuing his advance against Egypt. Ewald (Gesch. Isr. III. s. 630 sq.) proposes another hypothesis. He sets the expedition against Egypt before all which is narrated from xviii. 13 on. He suggests that Sennacherib marched into Egypt, by the ordinary way, by Pelusium; that he was there arrested and turned back by some extraordinary calamity to which Herodotus' story refers; that he then fell upon Judah with a greatly superior power, and that at this point in the course of events xviii. 13-xix. 37 comes in. But this hypothesis also is untenable, for, according to it, πῶς in chap. xviii. 13 must refer to a march of Sennacherib "from South to North," from Egypt towards Judah; but it cannot have any different meaning in ver. 13 from what it has in ver. 9, and there it is used of a march from Assyria to Judah, that is, from North to South. It is used in the same way in chap. xvi. 7 in regard to Tiglath Pileser's expedition, and in chap. xvii. 3 and 5 in regard to Sennacherib's. Moreover, it would be very astonishing, if the biblical narrative did not mention the march against Egypt with a single word, but only mentioned the retreat from there; for Sennacherib must have gone through Judah in order to reach Egypt, and Judah was hostile to him and friendly to Egypt. If, however, ver. 13 is to be understood as referring to the advance of the army, then vers. 14-16 must refer to the same and not to the retreat. Finally, Josephus proposes a third hypothesis. According to him, Sennacherib devastated Judah, but on the receipt of gifts from Hezekiah, withdrew, and advanced with his whole army against Egypt. Contrary to his agreement, under which the tribute was paid, he left Rab-shakeh and Tartan behind (κατέλιβε) that they might destroy Jerusalem. When, however, he found, after a long siege, that he could not take Pelusium, and when he heard of Tirhakah's advance, he suddenly decided to return to Assyria; ἵπποστρέψας δ' ὁ Σενναχρήβιος ἀπὸ τοῦ τῶν Αἰγυπτίων πολέμου εἰς τὰ Ἱεροσόλυμα κατέλαβεν ἐκεῖ τὴν ὑπὸ τῷ στρατηγῷ 'Ραψάκῃ δύναμιν τοῦ Θεοῦ λοιμικτὴν ἐνοσκήσαντος αὐτοῦ τῷ στρατῷ νόσον, κατὰ τὴν πρόβητην τῆς πολιορκίας νύκτα, διαφθεῖρονται μυριάδες ὀκτωκαίδεκα καὶ πεντακισχίλιοι . . . δεισας περὶ τῷ

στρατῷ παντὶ φεύγει μετὰ τῆς λοιπῆς δυνάμεως εἰς τὴν αὐτοῦ βασιλείαν εἰς τὴν Νίαν. There is but slight objection to this hypothesis. On the whole it is the most probable of all. Hezekiah became king in the year 727 B.C. In his fourteenth year (chap. xviii. 13) Sennacherib made this expedition, and sought to get possession of all the fortified towns in Judah. This was in the year 714. In 713 he marched against Egypt, leaving Rab-shakeh and Libnah, and, after his overthrow by the pestilence, he retreated to Assyria. This accords with chap. xix. 29, according to our interpretation of it. On the contrary, according to chap. xix. 7-9, Sennacherib appears to have heard of Tirhakah's advance, not when he was before Pelusium, but when he was once more before Libnah. That he boasted as he does in vers. 23 and 24, even after his retreat from Egypt, is not astonishing in the case of such a haughty king. Possibly he had drained off or dried up a few swamps in the neighborhood of Pelusium. There can be no more truth in Herodotus' story which he obtained from the priests than possibly this, that Sennacherib besieged Pelusium, but returned without having taken it. The rest, of course, is purely mythical. A mouse was the hieroglyph for devastation and destruction (Horapoll. Hierogl. i. 50); the inhabitants of Troas worshipped mice, οἱ τὰς νεύρας τῶν πολεμίων διέτραγον τούτων; also, the symbol of Mars was a mouse (Bähr, Herodot. Mus. i. p. 641). It may well be that Sennacherib was impelled by some natural occurrence to desist from the siege of Pelusium and to turn back, and this may have occasioned the story about the mice. If there had not been some event of the kind, he certainly would have advanced further than the frontier. The army cannot, however, have been rendered destitute of weapons (γυμνοὶ ὄντων) at Pelusium, or it could not have carried on war in Judah on its return. According to all this it can hardly be doubted that it is one and the same expedition of Sennacherib which is mentioned by Herodotus and by the Scriptures, nevertheless the further supposition which is commonly adopted, that the event mentioned in ver. 35 is the same one which Herodotus narrates, though under a mythical form (Bähr, l. c. p. 881), does not seem to us to be correct. That event took place in Judah, this one before Pelusium, and it is very improbable that the Egyptian priests should have made a myth out of an event which took place in another country, and did not immediately affect them, and should have commemorated it by a statue. We cannot determine definitely what the event was which occurred before Pelusium, but we must assume that it was a very striking and important one which influenced the haughty king to give up his plan and return to Assyria. In like manner, when he stood in Judah once more with his army of 185,000 men, and there assumed such a haughty bearing, some weighty incident must have occurred which determined him to hasten his flight.

[There is no reasonable ground for finding two distinct events in these two accounts, and without reasonable ground we cannot assume that two distinct calamities befell Sennacherib which were of such a character that they were regarded as divine interpositions. Pelusium was on the frontier, and it is not at all remarkable that an event which happened there, or even at Libnah, immediately after

Sennacherib had retreated from Pelusium, should figure in the history of both Judah and Egypt. Neither is it astonishing that the traditional account of the event should wear a mythical color; on the contrary, such events always take on mythical features. The biblical account is more original and direct, and is older than that of Herodotus, but it certainly refers to the same event.—W. G. S.]

However the fact may be in regard to this point, the story of Herodotus, which, as Delitsch says, "depends upon a hearsay tradition of lower Egypt," and which therefore appears as "a suspicious imitation of the biblical story," cannot be put on the same footing with the scriptural account, much less be used to correct it.

[SUPPLEMENTARY NOTE on the references to contemporaneous history in chaps. xviii. and xix. (See similar notes on the preceding chapters.) In the note on chap. xvii. we gave a summary of the Assyrian history, so far as it bears upon the history of the Northern Kingdom, especially upon the recolonization of Samaria by Sargon, Sennacherib, and Esarhaddon. This led us to notice some of the conquests of those kings, and so to observe the nationalities of the new population. We have now to go over the same reigns so far as they bear upon the history of Judah. Here also the Assyrian inscriptions offer us invaluable information for enlarging and correcting our knowledge of the biblical history.]

It might at first seem strange that the historical books of the Bible contain no mention of Sargon. We find that he was really king of Assyria when Samaria fell; that he subdued a revolt in Samaria a few years later; that he was the king who introduced a large part of the new population into Samaria; that he conducted two very important campaigns in Philistia, in both of which he came into conflict with Egypt, and in one of which he won the battle of Raphia, one of the great battles of Assyrian history. It is impossible that this all should have come to pass without exciting the attention and interest of the inhabitants of Judah. The author of the Book of Kings seems, however, to have so construed his task, that he did not consider himself called upon to notice campaigns of the Assyrians which never actually touched, or directly threatened, Judah. Isaiah (chap. xx.) mentions Sargon and his attack upon Ashdod rather in the way of a chronological date; but his reference shows that this expedition of the Assyrian king (or of his Tartan, commander-in-chief) formed an important event, and fixed a date for the Jews. Sargon was assassinated (it is not known by whom), in August, 704.

Sennacherib, son of Sargon, succeeded. We now possess very full accounts of his reign. These Assyrian statements and the biblical narrative of the conflict of Hezekiah and Sennacherib are in full accord so far as they go; but in the attempt to harmonize the details we meet with some difficulty, not from their inconsistency, but from their defectiveness. Lenormant and Rawlinson do not agree in their accounts of this section of the history. Rawlinson thinks that Sargon made or sent two separate expeditions into Judah; Lenormant thinks that the whole story belongs to one campaign. The chief argument against the theory of two separate campaigns is that only one is mentioned in the inscription, although, according to the usage of the inscriptions, the campaigns are always catalogued in their consecutive order, so that, if there was one against Judah, then one against Babylon, and then another against Judah, we should expect them to be so catalogued. Rawlinson's account makes a very clear and satisfactory narrative (see "Five Great Monarchies" II. 431-443 2d Ed. 161-168), but the usage of the inscriptions is so constant that we seem compelled to follow the theory of one campaign.

On the death of Sargon (704), Hezekiah revolted (xviii. 7) together with the kings of Phoenicia, Philistia, Ammon, Moab, and Edom. They had also sympathy and encouragement from Shabatoke (Sabakon II., the Sethos of Herodotus, son of Sabakon I., the So of the Bible), king of Egypt. It was not until Sennacherib's third year that he turned his attention to this revolt. An inscription on a cylinder in the British Museum reads thus:

"In my third campaign I marched towards Syria." He swept down through Phoenicia and Philistia, crushing all opposition. "The rulers . . . of Ekron" (Lenormant reads Migron, cf. Isaiah. x. 28) "had betrayed the king, Padi, who was inspired by friendship and zeal for Assyria, and had given him up bound in chains of iron to Hezekiah of Judah." The Egyptians came against Sennacherib and a battle ensued near Eltekon (Joa. xv. 59), in which the Assyrians won a great victory which ranked with that of Raphia in their annals. Sennacherib then took Ekron. He executed vengeance on the anti-Assyrian party. "I brought Padi, their king, out of Jerusalem, and restored him to the throne of his royalty." (This is the point at which the biblical narrative begins. The statement "in the fourteenth year of Hezekiah" (xviii. 13) has thus far proved irreconcilable with the inscriptions. It was the year 700. Rawlinson proposes to read "twenty-seventh" for "fourteenth.") "But Hezekiah, king of Judah, did not submit. There were forty-four walled towns and an infinite number of villages that I fought against, humbling their pride and braving their anger. By means of battles, fire, massacre, and siege operations, I took them. I occupied them. I brought out 200,150 persons, great and small, men and women, horses, asses, mules, camels, oxen, and sheep without number, and carried them off as booty. As for himself I shut him up in Jerusalem, the city of his power, like a bird in its cage. I invested and blockaded the fortresses round about it. Those who came out of the great gate of the city were seized and made prisoners. I separated the cities I had plundered from his country, and gave them to Mitenti, king of Ashdod, to Padi, king of Ekron, to Ishmabael, king of Gaza.

"Then the fear of my majesty terrified this Hezekiah king of Judah. He sent away the watchmen and guards whom he had assembled for the defence of Jerusalem. He sent messengers to me at Nineveh, the seat of my sovereignty, with 30 talents of gold and 400 (300?) talents of silver, metals, rubies, pearls, great carbuncles, seats covered with skins, thrones ornamented with leather, amber, seal skins, sandal wood, and ebony, the contents of his treasury, as well as his daughters, the women of his palace, his male and female slaves. He sent an ambassador to present this tribute and to make his submission" (Lenormant).

Thus the inscription omits all mention of the disaster which befell the Assyrians in this campaign, and which the Jewish and Egyptian traditions concur in affirming. There is no mention of the siege of Lachish, although that siege is represented on a bas-relief in the British Museum (Lenormant). This want of candor is not very astonishing, but it serves to show us that the account in the inscription lays stress upon the flattering circumstances and slurs over the disasters of the campaign.

Now let us interweave this with the biblical story. Chap. xviii. 13 is a parallel description of Sennacherib's devastations in the open country. The idea of the character of the campaign which we get from this verse is exactly that which the inscription offers in detail. Hezekiah was shut up in Jerusalem, and the enemy ravaged the country and destroyed the small towns at will. Hezekiah sent to sue for peace. He met with certain demands and he sent certain offerings. Yet in ver. 17 we find, when we expect to hear of peace, that an army was sent against him. The only explanation which suggests itself is that the offerings which he sent did not satisfy the Assyrian demand. Probably Sennacherib did not desire to make peace with Judah, but to get possession of Jerusalem, which he dared not leave behind him when he advanced into Egypt. Hezekiah desired to create the impression, by tearing off the decorations of the temple, that his resources were exhausted, though we find that he was able to make a boastful display of his treasures to the Babylonians, a year afterwards. Perhaps he did not send the full amount demanded by the Assyrian, pleading inability, and sending these decorations stripped from the temple as a proof that he had no further treasures. This gave Sennacherib an excuse for persisting in hostility. Rawlinson is led by this difficulty to suppose that Hezekiah paid the full amount demanded, and secured a respite. Three years later (698) Sennacherib came again, besieged Lachish, and sent the three great officers. Then there would be a gap of three years between vers. 16 and 17. With our present information it is impossible to decide definitely between these theories. During the siege of Lachish, whether it was in the campaign referred to in vers. 13-16 or in a later one, Sennacherib sent a detachment of his army to besiege Jerusalem, or rather, if possible, to secure its surrender, for it was of the highest importance for him to finish the reduction of the few strongholds which still held out in Judah and Philistia, so that he might push on against Egypt, before that nation recovered from the blow which he had already inflicted. Hence the parley of the three chief-men on each side. Encouraged by Isaiah, Hezekiah sent a refusal. On the return of the three Assyrians they found that Sennacherib was besieging Libnah, having taken Lachish. (Bähr, in the text of the Comm. above, assumes that Sennacherib had suffered a check at Lachish. The only ground for this is the belief that Libnah was north of Lachish, so that going from the latter to the former was a "retreat." The situation of Libnah, however, is so very uncertain, that this assumption rests on a slender support. There is no hint of any disaster to Sennacherib in this campaign until the great one recorded in vers. 35 sq. This seems to have interrupted him in the full tide of success.) The success which he had won, and the news that Tirhakah was coming with a new force of Egyptians, made Sennacherib more imtient than ever to finish the conquest of Jerusalem and Libnah. Tirhakah is called king of Ethiopia. The dynasty to which he belonged (the XXVth) was a dynasty of Ethiopians. He was the son of Sabacon II. mentioned above, and grandson of Sabacon I., called in the Bible, So. He seems to have been, at this time, crown-prince (Lenormant). He raised a new army to try to retrieve the disaster of Eltekon. Under these circumstances Sennacherib sent messengers once more to Hezekiah to demand a surrender, warning him to make terms while he could, and not to incur the total destruction which had befallen those who stubbornly resisted the Assyrian power. This was again refused, and soon after the great calamity fell upon the Assyrians which forced them to retreat without coming to blows with Tirhakah. Hence the story of this disaster was preserved both in Jewish and Egyptian annals, each nation ascribing it, as a great national deliverance, to its own God.

It will be seen that this gives a simple and clear explanation of many points which, in the above section of the Commentary, remain obscure. The question in regard to Sennacherib's invasion of Egypt is entirely solved, and it is not necessary to show in detail how much of the author's discussion of this question in the above Appendix, which was founded upon less perfect information than we now possess, is wide of the mark.

Sennacherib was assassinated in 680 by his sons Adrammelech and Asurnasrassor. Another son, Esarhaddon (Asahurakhidin [Asahur has given brothers]), had for a few years been viceroy in Babylon. He returned with hostile intentions against the assassins, who fled into Armenia. Esarhaddon was recognized throughout the Empire. —W. G. S.]

HISTORICAL AND ETHICAL.

1. King Hezekiah stands in the front rank of Israelitish kings. The general characterization which precedes the history of his reign gives him a testimonial such as no other king had received up to that time, especially in reference to that which was the main point for the history of redemption, namely, his bearing towards Jehovah and His Law. In the panegyric of the holy fathers, Sir. 44-49, he is placed in the same rank with David and Josiah (Sir. xlix. 5: "All the kings except David, Hezekiah, and Josiah, were guilty"). Not one down to this time had reproduced the model theocratic king, David, as he did. He was, as Ewald justly says (Gesch. Jer. III. 2. 621), "one of the noblest princes who ever adorned David's throne. His reign of 29 years offers an almost unmarred picture of persevering warfare against the most intricate and most difficult circumstances, and of glorious victory. He was very noble, not unworthy or wanting in courage (2 Kings xx. 20), yet by choice more devoted to the arts of peace" (2 Chron. xxxii. 27-29; Prov. xiv. 1). Von Gerlach, on the contrary, characterizes him often and in general as a "weak and dependant man," but this is in contradiction with his very significant name (see notes on xviii. 1), and still more with the testimony in xviii. 3-8, and cannot, moreover, as will be seen, be brought into accord with the story of the separate acts of his life. "How wonderful it was that the most godless king of Judah had the most excellent son. An Hezekiah follow ed an Ahaz" (Schlier). The Scriptures give no explanation of this. It is a mere guess when it is hinted that Hezekiah's mother may have influenced him, for we learn nothing more of her than just her name and that of her father. It is also a mere guess that she was "the granddaughter of Zachariah, who, under Uzziah, had such a good influence" (2 Chron. xxvi. 5) (Schlier). It is equally unsatisfactory when Köster says (die Propheten des A. T. s. 106): "Hezekiah was the opposite of his unbelieving father Ahaz; the difference is explicable from the fact that they had lived through the destruction of Ephraim, and that that event had had a mighty influence on both the king and the people of Judah." It is certain that Hezekiah did not wait until after the destruction of the kingdom of Israel before he began his reformation of the worship, but that he commenced it immediately after his accession to the throne. The notion of the rabbis, that he had Isaiah for his tutor and guide, as the high-priest Jehoiada was the tutor of Joash, seems more probable, but, not to mention the complete silence of the text in regard to this, it does not follow from Sir. xlviii. 25, and it is very improbable in itself, that Ahaz, who never himself listened to Isaiah, should nevertheless have entrusted him with the education of his son and successor. All these and similar grounds do not suffice to account for such a sudden and complete change of policy on the throne; rather we must recognize here, if anywhere, a dispensation of Divine Providence. Just now, when Ahaz had brought the kingdom to the verge of ruin, when the kingdom of Israel was near its fall, and little Judah alone still represented the Hebrew nationality, this Judah was, according to the decree of God, to take a new start, and to receive a king on the model of David, who should be a true and genuine theocratic king, and bring the true character and destiny of the nation home to the consciences of the people. Hezekiah was for Judah a gift of the Lord. In a true sense he was king by the grace of God of whom the saying held good: "The king's heart is in the hand of the Lord, as the rivers of water; he turneth it whithersoever he will" (Prov. xxi. 1). Therefore his whole life is somewhat typical. It shows more than that of almost any other king that God's ways are pure goodness and truth to those who keep his covenant and his testimony (Ps. xxv. 10).

2. The first thing that Hezekiah did after his accession to the throne was to abolish the idolatry which Ahaz had introduced, and to restore the legal worship of Jehovah. The history expressly states how far he went in this effort. He not only destroyed the heathen idols, but also put an end to the Jehovah-worship on the high places, which even Solomon, Asa, Jehoshaphat, Joash, Amaziah, and Uzziah had permitted to continue, and had not ventured to assail (1 Kings iii. 2; xv. 12, 14; xxii. 44; 2 Kings xii. 4; xiv. 4; xv. 4, 35). He returned to the original ordinances of the Mosaic Law, which prescribed not only one central sanctuary, but also one central worship (Levit. xvii. 8, 9; Deut. xii. 13 sq.). Hezekiah was, therefore, the restorer of that central worship which was so important and indispensable for the unity of the people and kingdom (see 1 Kings xii. 1-24, Hist. § 1). His reign, for this reason, forms an epoch in the history of Israel. It is moreover specifically stated that he destroyed

even the brazen serpent, which was of purely Israelitish origin, and to which there clung such important memories and associations for the people. This he did not do from puritanical zeal such as the later Judaism displayed (see 1 Kings vii. Hist. § 3), but because this σύμβολον σωτηρίας, as it is called, Wisd. xvi. 6, had been perverted by the people into an εἰδωλόν, whereas once every one who turned to it, οὐ διὰ τὸ θεωρούμενον εἰδωλεῖν, ἀλλὰ διὰ τὸ τὸν πάντων σωτήρα. To offer incense to this image was not only contrary to the Law (Ex. xxv. 5; Deut. v. 8, 9), but also it was senseless, because thereby the very thing through which Jehovah, by His own might and power, intended to grant salvation, was regarded as holy, and adored as divine. If there was anything which was contrary and hostile to the worship of the Holy One in Israel, then it was the worship of this image; therefore Hezekiah destroyed it as ruthlessly as he did all the other images. If we add to this all that is said in Chronicles about the restoration of the levitical worship by Hezekiah, then it is clear that no king of Israel since David had been filled, as he was, with zeal for the divinely-given fundamental Law. If we consider further that he ascended the throne in a time of deep decay, at a time when the temple of Jehovah was closed (2 Chron. xxix. 3, 7), and Judah was filled with all the abominations of heathenism, when disgraceful apostasy was widely spread among the great and mighty of the kingdom, then this king cannot certainly be called "a weak and dependent man." To carry out such a reformation under the most unfavorable circumstances, is not the work of a weak man; on the contrary, it presupposes courageous faith, and extraordinary energy.

3. The oppression of Judah by the Assyrians, and its deliverance from the same, is one of the greatest and most important events of the Old Testament history of redemption, as we may infer from the fact that it is narrated with such careful detail, and that we have no less than three accounts of it. How deep an impression the event made upon the mind of the people, and what great significance was ascribed to it, is shown by its express mention in the late apocryphal books, in Jesus Sirach xlviii. 18-21, in the books of Maccabees I. vii. 41; II. viii. 19; III. vi. 5, and in the book of Tobias i. 21 (of the Latin; i. 18, of the Greek, text). It is also generally admitted that the noble Psalm xli. refers to this event, if not also Ps. lxxv. and lxxvi. (Sept. ὡς πρὸς τὸν Ἀσσύριον). Assyria stood at the summit of its power under Sennacherib; it had become a world-monarchy. Besides the nations of Eastern [Central] Asia, it had subjugated Phoenicia and Syria, and overthrown the kingdom of the Ten Tribes. It was just ready to extend still farther and to subjugate Egypt. Having invaded Judah, which was already tributary, the conqueror had already devastated the country and captured the strongholds. Only Jerusalem yet remained. Now he threatened this last stronghold of the once prosperous kingdom. With arrogant and threatening words, scoffing at the God of Israel, he demanded a surrender of the city which was already hard pressed on every side, and spoke of carrying off its inhabitants into captivity. The greatest power on earth stood in hostility to the little kingdom of Judah, which was reduced to two small tribes, and rendered powerless by misgovernment. Its destruction seemed to be inevitable.

But just at this point the power which had hitherto been resistless was broken, and it remained broken. This world-monarchy now commenced to decline. [This is a mistake. The next half century (700-650) includes the height of the Assyrian power.—W. G. S.] A change took place in the affairs of Judah which secured it yet a century and a half of existence. This change in its affairs it owed, not to its own strength or courage, not to a great army which came to its help, not to any human power, but only to its Lord and God, who said to the roaring sea: "So far and no farther, and here shall thy proud waves be stayed!" The great and invincible army perished without a battle or a stroke of the sword, as the Lord had foretold by His prophet (Isai. xxxi. 8). In a single night Judah was delivered out of the hand of its mighty enemy. With the downfall of the kingdom of the Ten Tribes a new epoch had begun for Judah. It was, from this time on, to represent alone the ancient covenant people. The great act of divine deliverance which is here recorded stands at the commencement of this new era, as a new covenant-sign, and pledge of the election of Israel, but at the same time also as a loud call to faithfulness. This was the significance of an event which had had no parallel since the deliverance from Egypt. It is, therefore, put parallel with that great event which was the type of all national deliverances (see notes on xvii. 7, and Exeg. on 1 Kings xii. 28). In subsequent times of peril it was mentioned together with the deliverance from Egypt, as a ground of prayer for divine aid (see the places quoted from the books of Maccabees). As there was there, so there is here, an arrogant enemy, who obstinately resists the God of Israel, who oppresses Jehovah's people so that they cry to him. "As Moses there promised protection and deliverance, and said: 'These Egyptians whom ye see to-day shall ye see no more forever,' so Isaiah here promises help: 'Fear not! for the Lord will guard this city. He shall not come into it, but shall return by the way by which he came;' as there, 'Moses stretched out his hand over the sea and the sea returned at the dawning of the morning' (Ex. xiv. 27), so here, 'When they arose early in the morning, behold they were all dead, corpses': Isai. xxxvii. 36" (Von Gerlach on Ps. xli. 6); as there the angel of the Lord smote at midnight all the first-born in Egypt, and rose up against the oppressor, so that he sank in the sea with his chariots, his horses, and his horsemen (Ex. xii. 29; xiv. 19, 28), so he here smote the Assyrian army by night so that Sennacherib "arose, departed, and went" (excessit, erupit. Cic. 2 Cat. at the beginning). Ewald justly says: "One of those rare days had come again when the truth which no hands could grasp, forced itself home to the conscience and conviction of the people. . . . Nay, indeed, in the preceding long and weary distress and trial, as well as in the sudden deliverance, and in the convergence of all these things to enforce faith in the only true help, this time has a certain resemblance to the time of the foundation of the nation, just as, throughout all these centuries, few souls attained so nearly to the height of Moses as did Isaiah." What a deep impression the event made upon the neighboring peoples is shown by the words of Chronicles, where the history of it closes with the words: "And many brought gifts unto the Lord to Jerusalem, and presents to Hezekiah king of Judah, so that he was magnified in the sight of all nations from thenceforth" (2 Chron. xxxii. 23). So that came to pass which Hezekiah had prayed for in his prayer for God's help, chap. xix. 19.

4. The prophet Isaiah stands first and foremost among those who appear either speaking or acting in the foregoing history. He is the central figure of the story, so that it appears also in the book of his prophecies. All that constitutes the peculiarity of the Jewish institution of prophets, and its high significance in the history of redemption, by virtue of which it stands independent of, and even above, the priestly office and the throne, presents itself to us here in one person as it does not in any other case either earlier or later. Not only as a "human" counsellor in difficult political transactions" (Köster, Die Propheten, s. 106), as the king's privy-councillor, but as the servant and minister of Jehovah, the God of Israel, Who, through him, makes known His will and His decrees, and guides the fortunes of His people, and as the messenger and intermediary of the divine dispensations, Isaiah stands before us. He fulfils his mission most completely. Jerusalem and the kingdom of Judah were in peril such as had never before befallen them since they had existed. No one was prepared with advice or counsel. Anxiety, terror, and despair controlled all. In the midst of all this Isaiah stood firm and unshaken as a rock in the sea. With calmness and even joy, such as only a servant of Jehovah, who is conscious that he stands before his Lord, can feel (1 Kings xvii. 1; xviii. 15), he proclaims, in the name of his Master, deliverance to the covenant people, and destruction to the blasphemous foe, and as he says so it comes to pass. Where in the history of the ancient world is there anything at all resembling this? The oracle, vers. 21-34, belongs to the grandest which have been preserved, and is in the front rank even of those of Isaiah. All the things which we find to admire in the discourses of this prophet are here united. The language is clear and unambiguous, it is concise and rich, powerful and stirring, sharp in censure as well as consoling and encouraging. At the same time it is, in form and expression, poetical and rhetorical. The religious feeling on which it rests is the distinctively Israelitish, in all its depth and purity. The God, in whose name the prophet speaks, is the Holy One of Israel (see Isai. vi. 3), a character in which He has revealed Himself to this people alone, and in which no other people knows Him. At the same time He is a Being who is elevated absolutely above all creature limitations, and He governs all the nations of the earth according to His will. He has chosen Israel to be His own peculiar people, while it keeps His covenant. He is merciful and gracious, but He will not be scorned or blasphemed. The godless are an instrument in His hand, which He breaks and throws away when it has served His purpose. This discourse was indeed occasioned by the peculiar circumstances of the time, and it refers in the first place to them, nevertheless it does not lack that which is the deepest and inmost soul of all prophecy, the forecast of the distant future, the Messianic מָשִׁיחַ [the idea that out of all calamities a purified remnant shall still survive to carry on the office of the chosen people] (vers. 30, 31; cf. Isai. vii. 3; vi. 13; x. 21). This deliverance is the type and pledge of the one which shall go forth from Zion (Isai. ii. 2, 3).

5. The prophet's prediction of the destruction of Sennacherib is a prophecy in the common use of the word [something foretold], and every attempt to rob it of this character is shown to be vain, first by the great definiteness of the prediction, and secondly, by its undeniable fulfilment. Modern criticism, starting from the assumption that a specific prophecy is impossible, has declared ver. 7, as well as the concluding verses of the oracle, vers. 32-34, on account of their "suspicious definiteness," to be additions by the late redactor. This is indeed the easiest way to set aside any apparent prophecy. It is to be noticed, however, that the whole passage, from ver. 21 on, comes naturally and necessarily to this termination, and the tone and language are exactly the same as in the previous verses. [The artificial construction of the strophe and antistrophe make it impossible to regard vers. 32-34 as anything but an integral part of the original composition. See the arrangement in the translation.—W. G. S.] To take these verses away from the oracle is to rob it of all its point. It is both arbitrary and violent.

The so-called naturalistic explanation, which Knobel maintains, is not much better. According to this, the pestilence had then already commenced, and it threatened to weaken the Assyrian army very materially. News had also come that Tirhakah was advancing (ver. 9). These two things caused the prophet to "hope" that Sennacherib would not persevere, and, inspired by this hope, he "sustains his courage and exhorts the king and nation to confidence." But the assumption that the pestilence had at this time already broken out in the Assyrian camp is unfounded, it is entirely arbitrary, and it even contradicts the statements of the text in vers. 35 and 36. With this assumption the factitious "hope" of the prophet falls to the ground. Moreover it is perfectly clear that the prophet is not giving expression to a mere hope. As Knobel himself admits, "the tone is that of the utmost confidence," and "the passage (vers. 32-34) is perfectly definite."

Ewald's conception of it is much finer and more delicate. (Gesch. Isr. III. s. 634 [Ed. third s. 682]). He thus states his conception of the circumstances: In the first place, when Rab-shakeh uttered his threats, the prophet exhorted the king in general to courage and fearlessness (ver. 6). Afterwards, when Sennacherib's letter arrived and Hezekiah was in great anxiety, "Isaiah forthwith announced to him, if possible (!) yet more distinctly than before, the heaven-sent consolation. The bolder and more insolent the language of Sennacherib was, the more firm was the divine confidence against all his human vanity which Isaiah expressed in his mighty oracles. Thereby he powerfully influenced both the king and the people. He was the most unwavering support in this calamity, and the unswerving strength of his soul grew with the raging of the storm." However much this conception may contain which is grand and true, yet it does not rise above the idea that the prophet had a merely natural and human hope and foreboding. The prophet himself, however, means to have his words taken as something more than this. He could not possibly, with good conscience, say of something which he merely hoped for and foreboded: "Thus saith the Lord!"

[The question in dispute is: What did the prophets mean when they said: Thus saith the Lord! No one will assert that they meant that they had heard words with physical ears, or read words with physical eyes, which came to them from God. Their apprehension of the things which they thus announced must have been subjective, in so far that it was spiritual and conscientious. Then we come to a psychological analysis of the degrees of hope, expectation, faith, and foresight. If the process by which prophets apprehended divine oracles is utterly beyond the analogy of our experience, then, of course, it defies our analysis. But, in that case, it is a pure dogma which we cannot explain or state in words, and therefore cannot teach or transmit. We can repeat a formula, but we cannot form an idea. If, however, we have an analogy in our experience of faith and trust in God,—in our knowledge and conception of His laws,—and in our belief in His Providence, for the kind of activity which produced the prophecies, then we may indeed believe that the prophets acted upon a much greater measure of the same convictions. Certainly the prophets did not utter guesses, and pronounce them with a "Thus saith the Lord!" Any attentive reader of the prophecies will perceive that this formula has, in the mouths of the prophets, a truly awful meaning. They had intense convictions as to God's will and Providence, and a profound faith in His truth and justice. When they spoke it was without faltering, and with complete faith that they were pronouncing the oracles of God. The "definiteness" of this prophecy, which is made a ground for believing it post eventum, may be questioned. It is grand, broad, and poetic. It is not specific in announcing the form of the deliverance, but has the features of O. T. predictions. The more detailed treatment of prophecy belongs to the exposition of the prophetic books.—W. G. S.]

There was nothing in the circumstances to justify the expectation that the hitherto invincible conqueror, who was already in the neighborhood of Jerusalem with 185,000 men, would withdraw immediately. On the contrary nothing seemed more certain than that he would carry out his threats. Nevertheless Isaiah declared to the king and the people in regard to him, "in the tone of an ambassador of God" (Köster), with the greatest definiteness and confidence: "He shall not come into this city, &c." If this was mere surmise and supposition, then it was, under these circumstances, pure insanity to exhort Jerusalem to scorn and defy the conqueror at the very moment when it was in the greatest jeopardy; nay, even the comparison of Sennacherib with a wild beast with a ring through its nose and a bridle in its mouth, would be a piece of bombast no way inferior to that of Rab-shakeh. What would have become of Isaiah? What would have become of the prophetic institution, if he had then been mistaken in his mere individual and subjective supposition and hope? It is useless to turn and twist the matter. We must either strike out the entire oracle, or we must recognize in it a genuine prediction and admit that "the prophecy came not in old times by the will of man, but holy men of God spake as they were inspired by the Holy Ghost" (2 Peter i. 21). The fact that this event which was beyond the range of all human foresight and calculation, was definitely foretold by the prophet, gives it the character of an event determined beforehand of God for the deliverance of His people, that is, of an incident in the history of redemption, and takes away from it all appearance of an accidental, natural, occurrence.

[The question is: Were the prophets infallible? The author's argument seems to assume that they were. The assumption ought to be fairly stated and understood, and the issue involved ought to be fairly met. If the prophets, who were "men," "subject to like passions as we are" (Jas. v. 17), were infallible, why may not the Pope be so? If a distinction can be made, and if it be said that the prophets were infallible in their oracles, why may not the Pope be infallible when he speaks ex cathedra, though not otherwise? A fair criticism of this oracle will show it to be a prediction. The event which followed was a dispensation of Providence and an incident in the history of redemption (see bracketed addition to § 9, below). It rested on very much more than a hope or suspicion. It was a confident expectation which was based on trust in God and faith in His Providence. This amounted to a certain conviction in the prophet's mind, so that he did not hesitate to pronounce it in solemn form as God's will that Sennacherib's plan against Judah should be frustrated. He was obliged to stake his prophetic authority on this prediction. His religious faith rose above all the appearances of improbability (humanly speaking), that Sennacherib's course could be arrested. He did not fear, relying on his faith in God, to threaten Sennacherib with the most shameful overthrow. Sennacherib lived and prospered for twenty years afterwards (see Supplem. Note after the Exeg. section). If we insist on the literal accuracy, or even specific reference, of ver. 28 we shall make a grievous error, but, as a poetic expression for a prediction of shame and disaster to Sennacherib, it was completely fulfilled. Thus the event justified Isaiah's faith, and ratified his authority as a man of God; i. e., a man endowed with power to see and understand the ways of God. The notion that the prophets had communications from heaven, which gave them infallible information as to what was to be, is a superstition. The idea that they were men whose faith and love towards God gave them communion with Him, knowledge of His ways, insight into His Providence, and, therefore, foresight of His dealings with men, is a sublime religious truth,—one which deserves the study, as it will cultivate the religious powers, of every Christian man.—W. G. S.]

6. Hezekiah's behavior during the peril from the Assyrians appears to be inconsistent with the general characterization which stands at the head of the narrative (xviii. 5-7), inasmuch as he, who had the courage to declare his independence of the Assyrian supremacy, and who, according to 2 Chron. xxxii. 5-8, at Sennacherib's approach, not only took all possible measures for a determined resistance, but also encouraged the people to trust in Jehovah, its God, and not to fear, nevertheless instructed his ambassadors to ask for mercy, and declared himself ready to submit to any sacrifice which might be demanded of him (ver. 14). This one fact, however, does not justify us in regarding him as a "weak and dependent man" (see above § 1). We do not even know whether he took the step on his own motion, or, as is very possible, was forced to it by those who were about him. It was not until the Assyrian army had advanced even beyond Jerusalem, had taken one city after another and devastated the country, so that it seemed to him that Jerusalem could not much longer be defended, that he determined to make this humiliating offer. He had a good intention, which was to save Jerusalem and the kingdom of Judah from a fate like that of Samaria. Yet he did not send to the Assyrian such a message as his wretched father, Ahaz, had once sent: "I am thy servant and thy son" (chap. xvi. 7), but only went so far as necessity compelled him. Certainly he was not a hero in faith like Isaiah. "When he had taken the first step (the revolt), trusting in his God, then he ought to have taken the second, also trusting in Him" (Schlier), but that he did not do so does not prove that he had no faith. There are times in the life of every truly pious and believing man when the ground trembles under his feet, and he is wanting in firm and invincible faith. It was in such a moment that John the Baptist sent to ask the Saviour: "Art thou He that should come?" and yet the Saviour said of him that he was no reed shaken by the wind. Peter denied his master, and yet the master called him the rock on which the Church should be built. The time of peril from the Assyrians was, for Hezekiah, a time of trial and discipline. Soon after he had acted in faint-heartedness and despair he learned that help is not to be bought in distress by gold or silver. The treacherous foe only pressed him the harder, and then at last Hezekiah showed himself a true theocratic king. Recognizing a divine chastisement and discipline in this danger, he turns first to the prophet as the servant of Jehovah and the organ of the divine spirit, and sends an embassy of the chief royal officers and of the chief priests to him to beg his intercession. The solemn embassy was a physical recognition by the king of the prerogative of the prophet. It shows that where both were such as they ought to be there could be no question of "independent powers" over against each other (see 1 Kings xxi. Hist. § 4, and Pt. II. p. 104), but that both worked together, and had co-ordinate and complementary functions in carrying on the plan of redemption. The position which Hezekiah took up in his dealings with the prophetic institution, even when it was exercising its functions of warning and rebuke, may be seen from the incidental allusion in Jerem. xxvi. 18 sq. (See Caspari über Micha, den Morasthiten, s. 56.) In the case before us he did not rest content with the solemn embassy to the prophet, but went before the Lord, and poured out his heart to Him in prayer. Von Gerlach justly says: "It is most clearly apparent that, in this prayer, the inmost faith of a genuine Israelite is expressed." In true humility and fervor he calls upon the only living God, who has made heaven and earth, and who is the king of all kings of earth; who had chosen Israel to be His people, and dwells and reigns amongst them as a sign and pledge of His covenant. To Him, the Almighty One, who alone can help and save, he cries for help and salvation. He is not so much alarmed for his throne and his own glory as he is that the name of this God shall not be blasphemed, but rather be revered by all the world. We have no such prayer from any other king since Solomon. Because the Lord is near to all who call upon Him, and does what the god-fearing ask of Him, and hears their cry (Ps. cxlv. 18 sq.), therefore this prayer was heard. The Lord helped wondrously and beyond all Hezekiah's prayer or hope.

7. The Assyrian king, Sennacherib, and his chief cup-bearer form the sharpest contrast to Hezekiah and the prophet. The pride and arrogance which, as a rule, animate all great conquerors, is expressed by them. Such men, insolently relying on their own human power and might, recognize nothing superior to themselves, shrink from no means of gratifying their ambition for territorial aggrandizement, and insult and scoff at Almighty God, until He finally sends His judgments upon them and brings them to shame. The language which this ancient conqueror used is that of a heathen, but the spirit which animated it has not perished from the earth: it appeared again in the words of the greatest conqueror of modern times. When Napoleon, during his expedition to Egypt, said to a Mufti: "I can cause a fiery chariot to descend from heaven and to turn its course to earth;"—when, in his proclamation to the inhabitants of Cairo, he declared, denying the true God and putting fate in His place: "Can there be any one who is blind enough not to see that fate itself guides all my undertakings? . . . Inform the people that it is written from the foundation of the world that, after the destruction of all the enemies of Islam and the overthrow of the cross, I should come from the far west to fulfil the task which is set for me. . . . Those who raise prayers against us to heaven pray for their own damnation. I could demand from each one of you an account of the secret thoughts of his heart, for I know all, even that which ye have told to no one. A day will come when all will see that I have been guided by commands from above, and that all the efforts of men can accomplish nothing against me" (Leo, Universalggesch. V. s. 317. Baur, Geschichts- und Lebensbilder, I. s. 385, sq.)—is that not the same thing as Sennacherib boasts chap. xviii. 25, 35 and xix. 1 sq. in regard to himself, though with different words? It is an entire misconception, on the part of Ewald, when he thus states Sennacherib's policy and intentions (l. c. s. 596): "The wars between the numerous small kingdoms this side the Euphrates had, during the last centuries, assumed continually more and more the character of mere plundering expeditions. It was enough to merely rob and plunder a weaker neighbor. . . . There was no conception of a fatherland, a great kingdom which was a power to restrain wrong by justice and unity. But the 'warlike' [Ewald's interpretation of מלחמה] king, as the Assyrian king was now called before all others (Hos. v. 13; x. 6) desired

a great, united, and powerful kingdom, in which petty national jealousies should disappear." The Scriptures do not contain any hint of any such noble and beneficent intentions on the part of the Assyrian king. On the contrary, Sennacherib himself boasts that he has devoted all the conquered lands to destruction, and has caused the nations to perish (chap. xix. 11, 12). The Scriptures call Sennacherib especially a destroyer, plunderer, or robber (Isai. xxxiii. 1), whose heart is set to destroy and uproot nations, and who does not know that he is only a hired razor, the rod of God's wrath, and the staff of His anger (Isai. x. 5-7). That this man, the greatest and mightiest of the kings of Assyria, before whom all nations trembled, should come to shame in his contest with the small and weak kingdom of Judah, this proclaimed to all the world the great and eternal truth: He can humiliate even the proud!

8. The speech of the ambassador, Rab-shakeh, is a remarkable specimen of ancient oriental rhetoric. It has, in form and expression, none of the smoothness and fineness of modern diplomacy, but it is, in the method which it pursues, by no means out of date, but as fresh as if it had been spoken but yesterday. In the first part, which is addressed to king Hezekiah and his high officers, the speaker utters undeniable truths. It was true that Egypt was like a broken reed on which a man could not rest or rely. It was true that Hezekiah had abolished the worship on the high places and centralized the cultus in Jerusalem. It was true that if he had ever so many horses he lacked riders for them, while the Assyrian army was richly provided with both. It was true, finally, that this army had not advanced to Jerusalem and beyond without the permission of God; but all these truths stand here in the service of arrogance, hypocrisy, and falsehood. The ancient diplomat understood the falsely celebrated art of convincing by sophistical arguments, and yet of cheating and deceiving. When the royal councillors did not at once yield to him, he became rude and insolent towards them, and began to harangue the common people. In the first place, he puts before them the distress and misery which await them if the city is not given up at once; then he makes promises, tempts them and sets prosperity, and good fortune, and wealth before them; then he makes them suspicious of their king, and calls them to disobedience to him; finally, he undermines their religious faith, represents to them their trust in God as foolish and vain, and appeals to the fall of Samaria which (he declares) this God was as little able to prevent as the gods of the other nations were to prevent their overthrow. Here again we must exclaim with Menken, as above in the case of Naaman: "How true and faithful is the ancient picture! How fresh and new it is, as if men of to-day had sat for it!"

9. The destruction of the Assyrian army, which impelled Sennacherib to retreat, is unquestioned as an historical fact; it has not been assailed even by modern critical science. Its character as an incident in the history of the redemptive plan (see § 3) has, however, been taken from it by the assertion that it was due to one of the pestilences which were common in the Orient, and especially in Egypt; that the number of those who died is "exaggerated," and that the destruction in a single night is a mythical detail. Appeal is made in proof to the "frightful devastation which the pestilence accomplishes in a short time." Instances are cited such as that "at Constantinople, in 1714, nearly 300,000 human beings perished, and at the same place, in 1773, 2,000 died daily" (Winer, R.-W.-B. II. s. 232), and that "the pestilence in Milan, in 1629, according to Tadino, carried off 160,000 persons; at Vienna, in 1679, 122,849; and in Moscow, at the end of the last century, according to Martens, 670,000" (Delitsch on Isai. xxxvii. 36). As for the number 185,000, the fact that it is not "an exactly round number bears witness to its historical accuracy" (Thenius). Both accounts have it

Moreover it occurs 1 Macc. vii. 41, and 2 Macc. xv. 22, and Jos. Antiq. x. 1, 5. It is arbitrary to throw aside a number which is supported by such testimony and has nothing against it. It would not be allowed in the case of a number supported by so many profane authors. As for the assumed mythical detail that they all perished in one night, that is not the statement of the text; but that "the angel went out on that night and he smote," &c., that is, on that night the pestilence broke out in the Assyrian camp, so that in the morning very many already lay dead, and it raged until the whole army, 185,000 strong, was carried off. With that night the destruction of the entire army began. [That is hardly a fair reading of ver. 35. The angel went out that night and smote 185,000 men, and in the morning they were corpses. The naïveté of the remark, that they rose up and lo! they were all dead, belongs to the simplicity of the style of composition. Its meaning is clear that the 185,000 men did not comprise the whole Assyrian army. The intention of the history to declare that 185,000 men were smitten and perished in one night is undeniable.—W. G. S.] "In view of the conciseness of the record we may assume, with Hensler and others, that the pestilence raged in the Assyrian camp for some time, and that it carried off thousands by night (Ps. xci. 6) up to the number of 185,000" (Delitsch). If the words הָיָה הַיּוֹם were what made of the incident a miraculous interposition of God, they could not be wanting from the narrative in Isaiah; also the Chronicler, who does not in other cases show any distrust of what is miraculous, and the three places in the book of Maccabees, and that in Sirach, all of which mention the event, would not be silent as to that which would form the distinctive feature of it. When Knobel remarks that "the historian ascribes the event which brought about the deliverance of Judah to the God of Judah," we must ask, to whom else should he ascribe it? to Nature? to the climate? to accident? The God of Judah is the living God, who, as Hezekiah says (xix. 15, 19), made heaven and earth. He alone is God. If not a sparrow falls to the ground without Him (Matt. x. 29), then 185,000 men were not carried off without His will. As in the case of Isaiah's prophecy (§ 5), so here, all turning and twisting is useless. The incident was "a dispensation of God which evades until this day all attempts to solve its causes." We may admit that it was produced by the pestilence; "but, in the way of an attempt at a natural explanation, this amounts to nothing. No disease has ever, in its natural course, accomplished anything of the kind. All the extraordinary cases which are cited from history are only calculated to render the more prominent the fact that the incident here recorded is totally dissimilar from them all" (Drechsler).

[The miraculousness of the incident consists neither in the number of the slain, nor in the short space of time in which they perished. It consists in the fact that this extraordinary calamity befell the Assyrian army, by a dispensation of Providence, at a great crisis in the history of Judah. The ravages of pestilence in various historical instances are, therefore, no parallels. They are entirely aside from the point. The destruction of the Spanish armada by a storm is a far closer parallel than any one of these. We may hesitate to interpret these dispensations of Providence in modern times. The prophetic author of the Jewish history had no such scruples. He saw and plainly declared the hand of God in this event. "It is not without reason that in the churches of Moscow the exultation over the fall of Sennacherib is still read on the anniversary of the retreat of the French from Russia; or that Arnold, in his Lectures on Modern History, in the impressive passage (p. 177) in which he dwells on that great catastrophe, declared that for 'the memorable night of frost in which 20,000 horses perished, and the strength of the French army was utterly broken,' he 'knew of no language so well fitted to describe it as the words in which Isaiah described the advance and destruction of the hosts of Sennacherib.'" (Stanley, II. 534.) Our best means of arriving at a strictly historical conception of such providential interpositions as the one here recorded, is that of comparing them with other similar events nearer and more familiar to ourselves.—W. G. S.]

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Vers. 1-3. The noble Testimony which the Holy Scriptures bear to King Hezekiah. (a) He abolished the false worship in his kingdom and reestablished that which was in accordance with the word of God (vers. 3 and 4). (b) He trusted the Lord, clung to him, and departed not from Him (vers. 5 and 6). (c) What he did prospered, for the Lord was with him (vers. 7 and 8).—Vers. 3-6. LANGER: It is sad when godly parents have godless children and must see that all their pains are spent upon them in vain. On the contrary, where godless parents, especially a godless father, have pious children, we must look upon it as a direct fruit of the grace of God. The testimony to Hezekiah is, therefore, the more excellent the more depraved his father was. CRAMER: Virtue and godliness are not inherited from one's parents.—Ver. 4. Hezekiah succeeded in uprooting ancient abuses, because he was moved not merely by political or other human considerations, but only by love to the Lord, and zeal for His honor. He was anxious not only to root up, destroy, and deny, but also to set up in the place of what was evil that which was right and good.—The brazen serpent. The purpose for which Moses made it (John iii. 14 sq.); why Hezekiah destroyed it (worship of images and destruction of images. Use and abuse of images).—CRAMER: If the cross on which Christ hung were preserved by the papists it would certainly be a relic of remarkable antiquarian interest, but to keep a feast in its honor, make pilgrimages to it, and grant indulgences by virtue of it, would be pure idolatry.—Vers. 5 and 6. True piety consists of (a) a faith which is at once trust and confidence, Heb. xi. 1; (b) clinging to the Lord in adversity and in prosperity, without departing from Him, Ps. lxxiii. 25 sq.; (c) keeping the commandments of God, James ii. 17; 1 John v. 3.—Vers. 7 and 8. OSIANDER: God rewards godliness even in this life, Matt. vi. 33; 1 Tim. iv. 8.—STARKS: Only the faithful and pious can console themselves with God's favor, and boast that God is with them, Ps. cxviii. 6, 7; Ps. i. 3.—To throw off a disgraceful foreign yoke, and to take back what one has been robbed of, is not a breach of fidelity, but it is the right and duty of every ruler who wears a crown lawfully.—Vers. 9-12. See notes on chap. xvii. Hoshea and Hezekiah. The former came to the throne by conspiracy and murder, and he did not do what was pleasing to the Lord, therefore he perished with his people. The latter trusted in the Lord and clung to Him, and therefore he came out with his people victoriously from the peril.

Vers. 13-16. Hezekiah enjoyed peace and rest for fourteen years. His reign was a prosperous one; then, however, came the time of trial and danger, which does not fail to come even to those who have faith and trust.—BERLEA. BIBEL: No one can belong to God unless he passes through trial and discipline. The harder the trial is, the more must we increase our faith and dependence, for God chastises us only that He may make more clear His mercy and care for those who trust in Him.—The gold of faith can only be made to appear through the fires of adversity, Sir. ii. 5. If thy faith is not a mere notion, or opinion, or feeling, or sensation, then it will not diminish in the time of trial, but grow and become stronger and purer. "Whence should we have had David's psalms, if he had not been tried?" Therefore St. Paul says, Rom. v. 3 sq.—Ver. 14. There is nothing harder for any one who holds a high position than to humble himself, yet there is nothing more beneficial. The king finds himself compelled, in order to save his kingdom, to beg forgiveness of the monarch from whom he had revolted. That was the first consequence of his chastisement.—CRAMER: An oppressive peace is better than the most just war, and it is better to purchase peace than to risk kingdom and people, life and liberty.—When we see that we have done wrong we ought to confess it not only before God but also before men.—Do thou say to God what Hezekiah sent his ambassadors to say to Sennacherib. Thou wilt find Him not faithless, but always good and faithful, and He will lay upon thee no burden which thou canst not carry.—Ver. 17. We can never rely upon the fidelity of a man who is simply bought with money.—Want of courage in one's self invites an enemy to arrogance. The more humbly one approaches an enemy the more insolent he becomes.—Peace and quiet which are bought with money have no duration. [This ought to be taken to modify the doctrine quoted above (on ver. 14) from Cramer, that it is better to buy peace than to risk war.]

Vers. 17-35. Rab-shakeh's speech (a) to Hezekiah's messengers, vers. 19-27; (b) to the people, vers. 28-35. See Histor. § 8. That is always the way of the devil; he mixes up truth and falsehood, that he may inculcate us with the falsehood.—Rab-shakeh, the wolf in sheep's clothing. (a) He appears to warn against Egypt as a power which neither can nor will help, just as Isaiah himself does, while he himself comes to destroy and devour (Matt. vii. 15; 1 John iv. 1). (b) He represents what had been ordained by Hezekiah according to the Law of the Lord and for His honor as a sin and a breach of religion, while he himself cared nothing whatever for the Law of the Lord or the true and right worship. Beware of those who represent as weakness and folly that which is divine wisdom and strength (1 Cor. i. 18 sq.). (c) He claims that the Lord is with him and has commanded him to do what he is doing (ver. 25), whereas, in fact, he is only the rod of God's wrath, the staff of His anger, a "hired razor," and ambition, lust for gold and land, desire for glory and plunder are his only motives (Matt. vii. 22 sq.). Be not deceived by the prosperity and the victory of the godless. They are like chaff which the wind scatters and their way disappears (Ps. i. 3, 6).—Ver. 20. In what dost thou trust? Ask thyself this every day. Dost thou trust in other men who have rank, wealth, and influence (Ps. lx. 12; cxlvi. 3, 4; Jerem. xvii. 5); upon thyself, thine own power, wisdom, and judgment (Prov. iii. 5, 7; 1 Cor. i. 19, 20); or on the Lord alone (Ps. cxviii. 8, 9; cxlvi. 5; Jerem. xvii. 7, 8)?—Ver. 21. J. LANGE: How often it happens that when a man abandons God and seeks another reliance, he finds but a broken reed!—UMBERT: So weak and faithless men often prepare for those who are not satisfied with God's grace, but seek help from them, the deepest misfortunes. He who trusts only in God stands high and free even above the ruins of his earthly happiness; he who takes refuge in men becomes the slave of men.—Ver. 22. KYBURZ: It is the most deadly temptation of the adversary that he throws suspicion upon all which one has done for God, or upon all the spiritual good which one has wrought. This is the way of the devil and of the blinded world. They praise that for which one deserves punishment and make a threat of that by virtue of which one might hope for the favor of God. He who does not mean to fall under this trial must strive for the testing spirit that it may teach him to distinguish false and true, light and darkness, according to the divine standards (John xii. 4 sq.).—STARKE: When the world wishes to give pain to the pious it calls their trust in God obstinacy, and their constancy, arrogance.—WÜRT. SUMM.: Perverse and depraved men often consider true religion the origin of all misfortune.—Vers. 23 and 24. The boastful cannot stand before the eyes of the Lord (Ps. v. 6, 7). He says to them: "Speak not with a stiff neck," &c. (Ps. lxxv. 5-8. cf. Jerem. ix. 23, 24). "There is no king saved by the multitude of an host," &c. (Ps. xxxiii. 16, 17).—Ver. 25. STARKE: The godless do not want to have the appearance of making their undertakings under and with God; they boast that they do not do so, yet wrongly.—MENKEN: God uses the bad for purposes for which he cannot use the good. The prosperity of the wicked destroys them (Prov. i. 32).—How often a man puts his own wishes or thoughts in the place of the will of God and says or thinks: The Lord commanded me! It is crime, however, for a man to ascribe to the will of God that which sprang from his own evil lusts (James i. 13 sq.).

Vers. 26 to 28. The just Request of the King's Councillors to Rab-shakeh and his insolent Reply.—CRAMER: A Christian ought to be careful in all things and to try to avert harm wherever he can (Eph. v. 15).—Simple and uneducated people lend an ear far too easily to boasters, to those who distort truth, and allow themselves to be cajoled, because they lack insight to distinguish between appearance and reality, error and truth. Therefore not all subjects should be discussed before the multitude, in whose minds one distorted expression will often do more harm than the most reasonable discourse can cure. A faithful government ought to protect its subjects from hypocritical and lying teachers as much as from thieves and robbers. Ver. 27. He who cannot endure any contradiction, however moderate and just it may be, without becoming violent and angry, shows thereby that he is not aiming at truth and right, but that he has a selfish and insincere purpose.—Rab-shakeh was an official of the court and a man in high station, who did not lack wisdom and information; nevertheless his words show rudeness and vulgarity. High rank and position, even when united with wisdom and information, do not insure against rudeness and vulgarity. These only disappear where the life has its springs in God, and there is a purified heart and a sanctified disposition (Luke vi. 45).—Ver. 28–35. The ways and means of demagogues and those who stir up sedition. (a) Vers. 29 and 30. They cast suspicion upon the lawful authority, however righteous its intentions may be. They scatter abroad distrust of its power and of its good disposition, and strive to make the people discontented with all its ordinances. (b) Vers. 31 and 32. They promise to the people peace and prosperity and good fortune, deliverance from tyranny and slavery, in order that they may then lay upon it their yoke, which is far heavier and more disgraceful (Ps. cxl. 5). (c) Ver. 33 sq. They undermine the faith of the people under the pretence of enlightening it, while they themselves walk in darkness and are enemies of the cross of Christ. Therefore: "Watch ye, stand fast in the faith, quit you like men, be strong" (1 Cor. xvi. 13).—Ver. 28. STARKE: When Satan wants attentive listeners he talks God's language; therefore believe not every spirit (1 John iv. 1).—Ver. 30. The Lord will save us! (a) A noble saying in the mouth of a king speaking to his people. He thereby admits that his own power is insufficient and vain. He leads his people in that faith which is a confidence in what is hoped for, and which admits no doubt of what is not seen. How well it would be for all princes and peoples if they had such faith. (b) In this saying all the hope of the Christian life is expressed: With God we overcome the world, for the Lord will at length save and deliver us from all evil, and bring us to his heavenly kingdom. The blasphemer and boaster wanted to remove these words of the king from the heart of the people, because he knew that he should then have won. Nowadays also these words are laughed at and scorned. Let them not be torn from your heart! Happy is he whose trust is in the Lord his God (Ps. cxlvi. 5).—Ver. 31 sq. CRAMER: When Satan cannot accomplish anything by resistance and force, he strikes the softer strings and promises luxury, riches, splendor (Matt. iv. 9).—Ver. 33 sq. Pride and arrogance go so far that man, who is but dust and ashes, exalts himself in his folly above Almighty God.—PFAFF. BISEL: The Lord punishes with especial severity the crime of scoffing at the Living God and doubting of his might and majesty (2 Macc. ix. 28; Isai. xiv. 13–15).

Ver. 36 sq. The Impression which Rab-shakeh's Speech made. (a) The people kept silence and did not answer. (Silence is an answer—often a more emphatic one than speech. Happy is the people which is deaf to the words of seducers and those who stir up insurrection.) (b) The ambassadors of the king tear their clothes as a sign of grief and of horror at the blasphemous words which they had been forced to hear. Rab-shakeh was obliged to depart with his mission unaccomplished (1 Peter v. 8, 9).—Ver. 36. We ought not to enter into any dispute with those who do not care to arrive at the truth, but only to accomplish their own selfish ends, and who are versed in the art of mixing truth and falsehood, but we should punish them by silence.—Ver. 37. STARKE: We ought not to laugh at blasphemous speeches, but to be heartily saddened by them.—WURT. SUMM.: We ought not to get angry at a blasphemer, lest we also do some wrong, but we ought to wait patiently for the Lord (Isai. xxx. 15).—CRAMER: Cast not your pearls before swine, nor give what is holy unto the dogs (Matt. vii. 6). It is not always wise to answer a fool. There is a time for silence (Eccl. iii. 7).

Chap. xix. vers. 1–7. Hezekiah in great Distress. (a) He rends his clothes (as a sign of horror at Rab-shakeh's blasphemous speech). He puts on sack-cloth (as a sign of repentance), and goes to the house of the Lord (to humble himself before God, for he recognizes in his need and distress a consequence of sin and apostasy, and a call to repentance). (b) He sends the chiefs and representatives of the people to the prophet, from whom he hopes to hear the best counsel. He orders them to make known his request, and he is encouraged by him to stand fast in faith.—Ver. 1. The words in Ps. i. 1 apply to Hezekiah. A man who truly fears God cannot endure that unbelief should open its insolent mouth; his heart is torn when he hears the living God scoffed at. Woe to the people and country in which the speeches of the godless are listened to in silence and with indifference, without pain or grief, and where jests at God and divine things are regarded as enlightenment and wisdom (Luke xix. 40).—Vers. 2 and 3. In anxiety and perplexity our only consolation is to call upon God (Ps. xxxiv. 19; xlv. 1).—HALL: The more we hear the name of God despaired and abused the more we ought to love and honor it.—STARKE: It is of great importance that, in time of need, one should have a faithful friend, to whom one can confide all, and find counsel and help.—Ver. 4. CRAMER: We should not doubt in prayer, nor prescribe methods of action to God, but wait in patience and humility for the help of the Lord (James v. 10).—We should apply to others in our need that they may intercede for us. When a man like the Apostle Paul exhorts the believers to pray for him (Rom. xv. 30; Eph. vi. 18, 19), how much more does it become us to beg this service of love of others, and to console ourselves with the strength of the intercession of those who have intercourse of prayer with the Lord. He, however, who desires that others should pray for him ought not to have given up the habit of prayer himself. Hezekiah went first himself into the house of the Lord to pray, and then he sent to the prophet.—Ver. 5. What happiness and what a blessing it is in times of distress and perplexity to have a faithful servant of God at hand, who stands firm in the storm.—Vers. 6, 7. Isaiah's Answer (a) as a word of encouragement (ver. 6), (b) as a word of promising and threatening (ver. 7). The prophet calls the emissaries of the Assyrian king: "servants" [see Exeg. on the verse], a contemptuous name, because they had blasphemed the God of Israel. It is not manly to assume airs of superiority and to pretend to scorn the word of God, but it is boyish. However high in rank a man may be, if he speaks and acts as these men did he is a low fellow (Ps. xxxvii. 12, 13).—Ver. 7. God punishes those who have no fear of Him by making them fear men, and flee at the mere rumor of a danger which is not yet at hand. Pray God, therefore, that He may give thee the right spirit, not a spirit of fear, but of power and love and self-control (2 Tim. i. 7).—We think that danger threatens the Kingdom of God and Christianity when people write and declaim against it, but fear not: all these adversaries have perished like Herod who sought the young child's life (Matt. ii. 20), and only forfeited their own salvation, for "Whosoever shall fall on this stone shall be broken" (Matt. xxi. 44).—OSLANDER: God has many means whereby he can bring the rage of His adversaries to naught.—HALL: Proud and self-confident men of the world think little of the future consequences, and even while they are spinning their plots they come to shame.

Vers. 8-19. The two Contrasted Kings, Sennacherib and Hezekiah—the Godless and the Just. (a) Sennacherib, who sees himself in peril and obliged to retreat by the approach of Tirhakah, does not on that account become more modest or more humble, but only more obstinate and arrogant. That is the way with godless and depraved men. In distress and peril, instead of bending their will and yielding to the will of God, they only become more stubborn, insolent, and assuming. (OSLANDER: The less ground the impious have to hope for victory over the righteous, the more cruel do they attempt to be.) Hezekiah, on the contrary, who was in unprecedented trouble and peril, was thereby drawn into more earnest prayer. He humbled himself under the hand of God, and sought refuge in the Lord alone. He went into the house of God and poured out his soul in prayer, Ps. v. 5-7. (CALW. BIBEL: Learn from this to pray earnestly and faithfully, when thou art in distress; also learn from this what is the best weapon in war, and when the fatherland is in the dangers of battle.) (b) Sennacherib rejects faith in the God of Israel as folly, and boasts that all the gods of the heathen were powerless before him. He lives without God in the world and knows no God but himself. But it is the fool who hath said in his heart: "There is no God" (Ps. xiv. 1). He asks: "Where is?" &c., but where is now Sennacherib who talked so proudly? (Berl. Bib.) He is gone like chaff before the wind, for the way of the godless shall perish (Ps. i. 4, 6; xxxv. 5; Zeph. ii. 2). But Hezekiah will not let himself be drawn away from his God. His faith becomes only so much warmer and deeper. He prays and seeks not his own honor, but that of the Lord in whom he puts his confidence (Ps. i. 3). The greater the cross the greater the faith. The palm grows under weight. Sweetness flows from the grape when it is well trodden (Ps. i. 1, 2).—Vers. 14-19. Hezekiah's Prayer. (a) The appeal for hearing (vers. 15, 16); (b) the Confession (vers. 17, 18); (c) the request (ver. 19) (see Hist. § 6).—Distress and misfortune are the school in which a man learns to pray aright. How many a one repeats prayers every day and yet never prays aright. Every one knows from his own experience that he has never talked so directly with God as in the time of need.—STARKE: Earthly kings ought not to be ashamed to pray, but rather go before others with a good example.—ARNDT: Who is a true man? He who can pray, and who trusts in God.—Ver. 15. Under the old covenant God dwelt above the cherubim of the ark; under the new one, He dwells in Christ amongst us, therefore He demands to be addressed by us as the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ.—Ver. 16. "He that planted the ear," &c. (Ps. xciv. 9). Though men do not hear or see, He hears and sees all, even that which is said and done in secret (Ps. cxxxix. 1 sq.). It often seems as if He did not see or hear, but he will some time bring to light what was done in darkness, and will make known the secret counsel of the heart. We must give an account of every vain word which we have spoken.—Vers. 17, 18. Gods which are the work of man's hands, or the invention of man's brain, can be thrown into the fire and destroyed. They are good for nothing more, but the Holy, Living God cannot be thus done away with or destroyed. He is himself a consuming fire which shall consume all the adversaries (Heb. x. 27; xii. 29).—Ver. 19. When we pray to God for relief from distress, or for anything else which we earnestly desire, we must not have our own honor, or fortune, or prosperity altogether or principally at heart, but we must try to bring it about that, by the fulfilment of our prayer, God's name may be glorified and hallowed. Therefore this petition stands first in the Lord's Prayer.

Vers. 21-34. Isaiah's Prophecy (a) against Sennacherib, vers. 21-28; (b) on behalf of Jerusalem, vers. 29-34.—Ver. 21. There is no more fitting punishment for a proud and arrogant man, than to be laughed at and derided without being able to take revenge. The derision of the daughter, Zion, at the blasphemous boaster, Sennacherib, is not due to sinful malice; it is rather a joyful recognition and a praise of the power and faithfulness of God, who reigns in heaven and laughs at those who scoff at him (Ps. ii. 4; xxxvii. 12, 13).—Ver. 22. When sinful man, who is dust and ashes, ascribes to himself that which he can only do by God's help, or which God alone can do, that is a denial and an insult of God.—Ver. 23. Here we see the mode of thought and of speech of all the proud. All this have I done by my wisdom and courage and skill. The Apostle, who had labored more than any other, responds to them all: "What hast thou that thou didst not receive? Now if thou didst receive it, why dost thou glory, as if thou hadst not received it?" (1 Cor. iv. 7, cf. xv. 10).—CRAMER: When we remember that the affair is not ours but God's, then we see that the enemies are not ours but God's. When we see the pride and arrogance of our enemies, then we may look for their fall very soon (Prov. xvi. 18).—Ver. 25. If no hair of our heads can fall without the will of God, how much less can a land or a city perish unless He has so ordained it? Therefore, humble yourselves under the mighty hand of God that He may exalt you in His good time (1 Peter v. 6).—Ver. 26. "Let all the earth fear the Lord: let all the inhabitants of the world stand in awe of Him" (Ps. xxxiii. 8), for they are like the grass of the field before Him; He causes the wind to blow upon them and they are gone.—Vers. 27, 28. Be not deceived by the victory and good fortune of the enemies of the kingdom of God, to think that God is with them. He knows their going out and their coming in, their rage and their arrogance. They are in His hand and He uses them without their knowledge for His own purposes. They cannot take a step beyond the limits which He has set for them. When they have done what He intended them to do, He puts His bridle in their mouths and leads them back by the way by which they came. (As Sennacherib came to Jerusalem, so came Napoleon to Moscow. Then the Lord called to him: "So far and no farther!" and led him back by the way by which he came.) Isai. xiv. 5, 6; x. 12-15.—Ver. 29. All sowing and reaping should be to us a sign of what God does for us and what we ought to do for Him (Gal. vi. 7-9; 2 Cor. ix. 6; Jer. iv. 3; Hos. viii. 7; James iii. 18; Sir. vii. 3; Eccles. xi. 4, 6). God does not always give full harvests in order that we may learn to be satisfied with little, and may not forget that His blessing is not tied to our labor, but that He gives it where and when He will.—Vers. 30 and 31. STARKE: In the midst of all calamities God preserves a faithful remnant for Himself which shall praise and spread abroad His name (Ps. xlv. 3 to 5; xxii. 30).—THE SAME: The Church of Christ is invincible. However much it may be oppressed at times, yet God preserves a secret seed for Himself (Matt. xvi. 18; 1 Kings xix. 18).—The deliverance goes forth from Zion (Isai. ii. 2, 3): salvation comes from the Jews (John iv. 22).—The saved form the holy seed (Isai. vi. 13), which takes root below and bears fruit above. The ground in which they take root and stand firm is Christ (Eph. iii. 17; Col. ii. 7). The fruit which they bear is love, joy, peace, &c. (Gal. v. 22). They never perish. They continue from generation to generation. However small their number, and however fiercely the world may rage against them, they nevertheless endure, for the Lord is their confidence. His truth is their shield (Ps. xci. 4). Therefore, "Fear not, little flock," &c. (Luke

xii. 32).—Vers. 32-34. Jerusalem, the earthly City of God, a Type of the Eternal City, the Church of Christ. If God protected the former so that no arrow could come into it, how much more will He protect the latter, break in pieces the bows of its enemies, and burn their chariots in fire. Cf. Ps. xlv. 1, and Luther's hymn: "Ein feste Burg," &c.

Vers. 35 to 37. Sennacherib's Fall. (a) A miracle of the saving power and faithfulness of God; (b) a terrible judgment of the Holy and Just God (see Histor. § 9).—Cf. Psa. xlv. 1, lxxv., and lxxvi. VON GERLACH: When such times recur, similar psalms and hymns are given to the Church, as in 1530 the hymn: "Ein feste Burg ist unser Gott," which is founded on Ps. xlv., was composed. (Compare the noble hymn of Joh. Heermann: "Herr, unser Gott, lass nicht zu Schanden werden.")—God's judgments are often delayed for a long time, but then they come all the more suddenly and mightily (Ps. lxxiii. 19). A single night may change the whole face of the matter. Where is now the boaster? Where is the multitude of his chariots? Luke xii. 20.—Sennacherib's calamity and his retreat proclaim to all the world that God resisteth the proud, and they are a testimony to the truth of 1 Sam. ii. 6-10.—He who had smitten whole kingdoms and peoples fell under the blows of his own sons. "With what measure ye mete it shall be measured to you again" (Luke vi. 38).—OSIANDER: When God has sufficiently chastised His Church, He throws the rod of His wrath into the fire, Isai. xxxiii. 1.

B.—Hezekiah's Illness and Recovery; his Reception of the Babylonian Embassy, and his End.

CHAP. XX. 1-21. (ISAI. XXXVIII.)

- 1 In those days was Hezekiah sick unto death. And the prophet Isaiah the son of Amoz came to him, and said unto him, Thus saith the Lord, Set thine
- 2 house in order; for thou shalt die, and not live. Then he turned his face to
- 3 the wall, and prayed unto the Lord, saying, I beseech thee, O Lord, remember now how I have walked before thee in truth [fidelity] and with a perfect heart, and have done that which is good in thy sight. And Hezekiah wept sore.
- 4 And it came to pass, afore Isaiah was gone out into the middle court,¹ that the
- 5 word of the Lord came to him, saying, Turn again, and tell Hezekiah the captain [prince] of my people, Thus saith the Lord, the God of David thy father, I have heard thy prayer, I have seen thy tears: behold, I will heal thee:
- 6 on the third day thou shalt go unto the house of the Lord. And I will add unto thy days fifteen years; and I will deliver thee and this city out of the hand of the king of Assyria; and I will defend [protect] this city for my own sake,
- 7 and for my servant David's sake. And Isaiah said, Take [Bring] a lump of figs.
- 8 And they took [brought] and laid it on the boil, and he recovered. And Hezekiah said unto Isaiah, What shall be [is] the sign that the Lord will heal me,
- 9 and that I shall go up into the house of the Lord the third day? And Isaiah said, This sign shalt thou have of the Lord, that the Lord will do the thing that he hath spoken: shall the shadow go forward ten degrees, or go back ten degrees? [the shadow is gone forward ten degrees,—if it go back ten degrees?]
- 10 And Hezekiah answered, It is a light thing for the shadow to go down ten de-
- 11 grees: nay, but let the shadow return backward ten degrees. And Isaiah the prophet cried unto the Lord: and he brought the shadow ten degrees backward, by which it had gone down in [on] the dial [stairs] of Ahaz.
- 12 At that time Berodach-baladan, the son of Baladan, king of Babylon, sent

- letters and a present unto Hezekiah: for he had heard that Hezekiah had been 13 [was] sick. And Hezekiah hearkened unto them [rejoiced because of them],^a and shewed them all the house of his precious things [treasury], the silver, and the gold, and the spices, and the precious ointment, and all the house of his armour [armory], and all that was found in his treasures: there was nothing in his house, nor in all his dominion, that Hezekiah shewed them not.
- 14 Then came Isaiah the prophet unto king Hezekiah, and said unto him, What said these men? and from whence came they unto thee? And Hezekiah said, 15 They are come from a far country, even from Babylon. And he said, What have they seen in thine house? And Hezekiah answered, All the things that are in mine house have they seen: there is nothing among my treasures that I 16 have not shewed them. And Isaiah said unto Hezekiah, Hear the word of the 17 Lord. Behold, the days come, that all that is in thine house, and that which thy fathers have laid up in store unto this day, shall be carried unto Babylon:
 18 nothing shall be left, saith the Lord. And [some] of thy sons that shall issue from thee, which thou shalt beget, shall they take away; and they shall be 19 eunuchs in the palace of the king of Babylon. Then said Hezekiah unto Isaiah, Good is the word of the Lord which thou hast spoken. And he said, Is it not good, if peace and truth be in my days? [And he said: Verily; may there only be peace and security in my days.]
- 20 And the rest of the acts of Hezekiah, and all his might, and how he made a pool, and a conduit, and brought water into the city, are they not written in 21 the book of the Chronicles of the kings of Judah? And Hezekiah slept with his fathers: and Manasseh his son reigned in his stead.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

^a Ver. 4.—[On the keri see Exeg. The E. V. follows it as do Thenius and Ewald. The chetib reads "the middle city." It is adopted by Kell, Bunsen, and Bähr.—W. G. S.]

^b Ver. 18. That לְכָל is not the original reading, but לְכָל, which we find in Isai. xxxix. 2, is evident from לְכָל which follows. The latter reading is also supported by all the ancient versions.—Bähr.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 1. In those days. By these words Hezekiah's illness is referred to the time of the last-mentioned events, but only as a general designation of the time of its occurrence (Keil). It fell, like those events, in the middle of his reign. The expositors are not agreed, however, whether it took place before or after Sennacherib's retreat. The majority of the modern scholars adopt the opinion that it was before that event, founding their opinion on ver. 6. There he is promised fifteen years more of life, and Sennacherib's retreat is spoken of as something which has not yet come to pass. Now, as Hezekiah, according to chap. xviii. 2, reigned twenty-nine years, and Sennacherib invaded Judah in his fourteenth year (xviii. 13), this illness must have befallen him, it is argued, in his fourteenth year, either "at the beginning of Sennacherib's invasion" (Keil), or "while the Assyrians were still besieging Jerusalem" (Thenius). It is further alleged in support of this view that Hezekiah showed to the Babylonian embassy, which came to congratulate him, treasures of gold and silver (xx. 13), but that he had given up everything of this kind which he had (xviii. 15) to Sennacherib, so that his illness and recovery must have taken place before the retreat of the Assyrians (Delitsch and Hahn). These may appear to be very forcible arguments, but there are opposing considerations of the highest importance. In the first place, both narratives put the story of Hezekiah's illness after the account of the Assyrian invasion, and as Calmet observes: Neque ego libenter desero seriem et ordinem rerum in libris sacris deductam, nisi valida id argumenta suadeant. It has indeed been urged that the historian placed the story of Sennacherib's retreat (xix. 35 sq.) first, because "he desired to finish up the story of the Assyrian invasion, so as not to be obliged to return to it" (Knobel). But the Chronicler makes this hypothesis, which is in itself improbable, entirely inadmissible, for he says that Hezekiah was highly honored by all nations on account of this deliverance, and that many sent presents to him, and then he proceeds to give the story of his illness (2 Chron. xxxii. 22-31). Josephus also asserts very positively that Hezekiah and all the people offered thank-offerings to God, and showed great religious zeal, but that then (μετ' οὗ πολὺ) he was afflicted by a severe illness. Secondly, the Babylonian embassy cannot be assigned to the period before the retreat of Sennacherib, nor to any time during the Assyrian invasion, for the king of Babylon, who was a vassal of the king of Assyria, would not have dared to congratulate Hezekiah at that time when he was in revolt against the suzerain of both, and he would have had no grounds for seeking an alliance with Hezekiah when he was in distress and peril. Thirdly, Hezekiah's hymn of thanksgiving (Isai. xxxviii. 10) begins with the words: "I said (that is, I thought) in the cutting off (interruption, period of tranquillity) of my days," &c.; i. e., "when a period of rest had come in my life, a pause in the midst of the ceaseless toil and care and danger of life" (Drechsler); when I believed that I was relieved from all danger by Sennacherib's retreat, and that I could live on in peace and security, then came a new trouble and danger, and it seemed that I must go down to the grave. Against all these important considerations, which are taken from history, it cannot be argued that "the former story [of the peril of Jerusalem] is placed first because it is most important" (Von Gerlach), for what would become of the art of writing history, if historians should narrate later events before they did earlier ones, because the former were more important? As for ver. 6, the number "fifteen" cannot be arithmetically accurate, for if it were so, then not only Sennacherib's invasion and Hezekiah's illness, but also the journey of the army of at least 185,000 men through the desert el Tih to Egypt, the siege of Pelusium, the return to Judah, the siege and conquest of the "fenced cities," the devastation of the country, and finally, the destruction of Sennacherib's army and his retreat, and even the embassy from Babylon, must all have taken place in one year.—Hezekiah's fourteenth, and this appears impossible, considering that they had no railways. Isaiah's words in vers. 5 and 6 are not an historical allusion, but a prophetic oracle. In the prophetic style numbers have not always their strict, arithmetical value, but are clothed with a significance of another character. The number 15, in this case, is not, indeed, as Knobel thinks, "contributed by the redactor, ex eventu," and put in the mouth of the prophet, who could not know how many years longer Hezekiah was to live," but still we ask why should he have just fifteen years longer, and not one more or one less? Fifteen is not what is commonly called a round number. It will not do to answer this by the anticipatory statement (xviii. 2) that Hezekiah reigned twenty-nine years. Not because he was to reign twenty-nine years in all were fifteen years more assigned to him, but because he was spared for fifteen years more his whole reign amounted to twenty-nine years. When he was taken ill he had finished his fourteenth year and begun his fifteenth. He was then thirty-nine years old, in the prime of life. Suddenly he stood on the brink of the grave, and it was all the more painful to him to quit life at this moment, because he had just been delivered from his most powerful enemy, and had hopes of being able to reign now in peace and quiet. It was regarded as a very great misfortune to be called away in the prime of life, hence his earnest prayer (ver. 3), which had no other sense than this: "O my God! take me not away in the midst of my days" (Ps. cii. 24, cf. lv. 23). The prophet promises him the fulfilment of this prayer, and that he shall reign as much longer as he had already reigned. The words which follow: I will deliver thee out of the hand of the king of Assyria, then refer to the remainder of his reign. In the new lease of life which was to be given him, he should fear nothing from the great and mighty enemy; he should reign in peace. This promise was of the greatest importance, for, although Sennacherib had fled in disgrace, yet he was still very powerful and very dangerous, and his wrath against Judah was fiercer than ever (Tobias i. 18). He might collect his forces and make another expedition against Judah. In fact, he did immediately collect an army and march against Babylon which had revolted. Thus the words are understood by Vitringa, Clericus, Gesenius, Rosenmüller, and Drechsler, and the latter adds the pertinent remark that, if ver. 6 had been spoken before the events narrated in chaps. xviii. and xix. took place, then xix. 34 would be only a repetition of the promise in that verse.

Ver. 1. Thus saith the Lord: Set thine house in order; literally: Give commands in regard to thine house, i. e., take the necessary measures for the management of thine affairs (cf. 2 Sam.

xvii. 23, where לִפְנֵי stands for לְפָנַי). It does not mean "make known thy (last) will" (Knobel, Gesenius), nor, "give commands in regard to the succession to the throne" (Hess).—To the wall (ver. 2), not in dissatisfaction as Ahab did, 1 Kings xxi. 4 (Hitzig), but away from those who were present, in order that he might pray more freely and collectedly.—O Lord! remember now (ver. 3). To fall a victim of disease in the midst of his days seemed to the king, in view of proverbs like Prov. x. 27: "The fear of the Lord prolongeth days, but the years of the wicked shall be shortened," to be a proof of having displeased God, that is, to be a punishment. He therefore prays God to remember also the good which he has striven to do, and "takes refuge in the promises which God had given in the Old Testament that good works should be rewarded by length of days" (Starke). For the rest, his words are not to be taken as referring in a general way to moral purity, but, as the expressions "with a perfect heart," and "good in thy sight" show, as referring especially to his zeal for the pure worship of Jehovah, and his earnestness against every form of idolatry. (On לִפְנֵי see notes on 1 Kings xi. 4 and 6).—And Hezekiah wept sore. Josephus declares that, in addition to the disease, there was now great ἀστυμία, because he was to die childless and leave the kingdom without an heir, and that, in this difficulty, he prayed to God with tears, that He would allow him to live a little longer until he had become a father. The Church fathers and many other ancient expositors adopt this conception of the circumstances, and point, in its support, to the fact that the son and successor of Hezekiah, Manasseh, was only twelve years old when his father died (chap. xxi. 1), that is, he was born three years after this illness. Ewald calls this a "fiction" and appeals to Isai. xxxviii. 19 and xxxix. 7. It certainly is hardly credible that Hezekiah was childless at the age of thirty-nine; it is not necessary to assume that Manasseh was the oldest son (see note on 1 Kings i. 5); and it is possible that the older sons had died before Hezekiah did. The only reason for his tears is the one which he gives in his hymn of thanksgiving, Isai. xxxviii. 10 sq.

Ver. 4. Afore Isaiah had gone out into the middle city. The middle city is "the central part of the city, i. e., of Mt. Zion where the royal castle was situated." The כִּנְזָר (the middle court" [E. V.], not of the temple but of the castle), is presented by all the ancient versions, but it is only an interpretation of כִּנְזָר as referring to the castle after the analogy of x. 25 (Keil). מִבְּנֵי does not mean the "inner" city, in contrast with the houses which lay outside of the wall of Mt. Zion (Knobel), but only, the middle one.—The words in

ver. 5 from "behold" to "house of the Lord" are wanting in Isaiah xxxviii. 5, but are brought in in xxxviii. 22. At this point it is quite evident that the account in Isaiah is very much abbreviated. The words on the third day (ver. 5) need not be taken literally, but they certainly do not mean "within a few weeks" (Hitzig). The phrase, prince of my people, which is added, indicates the ground for assisting him.—On ver. 6 see notes on ver. 1. The closing words: For mine own sake, &c., are wanting in Isaiah because they already occur in xix. 34 (Isai. xxxvii. 35). They have here the same force as there. They are not, therefore, to be understood as containing any special reference to the circumstance that Hezekiah had no son, but that, nevertheless, the house of David should not become extinct, as the old expositors understood.—הַחֵלֶת הַחֲמִינִים, ver. 7, means properly a pressed mass of figs. הַחֵלֶת without חֲמִינִים means a cake of figs (1 Sam. xxv. 18; xxx. 12). This was laid upon הַשֹּׁחֵן, strictly, the inflammation, hence, the fester, or boil (Job ii. 7; Ex. ix. 9). It is ordinarily understood to refer to a plague-sore, and it is inferred that Hezekiah was afflicted with "the plague which had carried off the Assyrian army" (Knobel), "the contagion of which had been transmitted to the king" (Winer and others); but this is utterly false. For, in the first place, שֹׁחֵן never occurs in reference to a plague, and then again, only one sore is here spoken of, whereas the plague produced several on different parts of the body. Moreover a plague or pestilence never occurs in isolated cases, but as an epidemic. There is not the slightest hint that any such disease raged in Jerusalem either before, or during, or after the Assyrian invasion. Still further, figs are not applied as a specific remedy for plague-sores. In pestilence "no medicines are administered except at the commencement of the disease, something to produce perspiration" (Winer, R.-W.-B. II. s. 233). Figs were the usual remedy for boils. Dioscorides says of them: διαπορεῖ σκληρίας; Pliny: Ulcera aperit; and Jerome remarks on Isai. xxxviii.: Secuta artem medicorum omnis sanies vicioribus ficiis aquae continis in cutis superficiem provocatur (cf. Colius, Hierobot. II. p. 373). We cannot define more nearly what sort of a boil it was. Ewald thinks it was "a fever-boil;" according to Thenius "a single carbuncle formed under the back of the head," but this is a pure guess. [The ground for Thenius' idea, which goes as far as is possible towards defining more nearly the character of the disease, is, that there was a single sore, and that it was about to prove fatal. A carbuncle, particularly in such a place, would answer this description.—W. G. S.]

Ver. 8. And Hezekiah said unto Isaiah, What is the sign, &c. In his deep anxiety the sick man desires an external sign to strengthen his faith in the prophet's words. Such signs usually attended a prophet's promises (Isai. vii. 11, 14; chap. xix. 29). This demand of the king is not at all astonishing in view of the words addressed to Ahaz in Isai. vii. 11: "Ask a sign," &c. There also the prophet allowed the king to choose what the sign should be. Vers. 9, 10, and 11 are condensed in Isaiah into one verse. In ver. 9 Drechsler rejects the ordinary translation [that of the E. V.] which makes of the last part an alternative question. He asserts that that translation is "simply impossible." He translates: "The shadow shall advance ten degrees, or shall it recede ten degrees?" taking הָלַךְ as a command. "The prophet determines, in the first place, that it shall advance, then he interrupts himself, corrects himself, and leaves the king to determine which it shall do." But it is only in disjunctive questions that אִם means or, and the prophet does not "correct himself" in such a solemn expression. Keil also, in his new commentary, translates: "The shadow has advanced ten degrees—if it should recede ten degrees?" He takes the second clause hypothetically: "Whether it may indeed," &c., which is not only forced but also unclear. Hezekiah's answer presupposes a disjunctive question. As in Isai. vii. 11, the prophet asks the king whether he will ask a sign in the depth or in the height, so here he asks Hezekiah whether the sign of the shadow shall be that it shall go forward or backward. It cannot be objected that הָלַךְ is wanting with הָלַךְ, for this is often the case, and the question is designated only by the tone of the voice (Gen. xxvii. 24; 2 Sam. xviii. 29. Gesen. Gramm. § 153. 1). [The argument for reading ver. 9 as a disjunctive question resolves itself into an inference from Hezekiah's answer. Regarding simply the grammar of ver. 9 there are two obstacles to this rendering; first, the omission of הָלַךְ, which is never omitted in a disjunctive question, and secondly, the perfect tense הָלַךְ. Keil's translation is therefore better. "The shadow has advanced ten degrees—if it should recede ten degrees?" would that be a satisfactory sign? It is true that the answer of Hezekiah does not seem to fit well to this question. The only other and more satisfactory solution of the difficulty is that which involves an alteration of the text. Knobel and Hitzig read הָלַךְ. It seems necessary to supply also הָלַךְ as having fallen out before הָלַךְ. The reading would then be:

What sign shall there be? The shadow's advancing? or shall the shadow recede? Keil's objection (Comm. s. 344 note 2), that the inf. abs. would, in that case, be used for the future, would not apply. The inf. abs. must be understood in its most ordinary use to express directly and simply the verbal idea.—See Gramm. and also Etzeng. notes on אָבָל, chap. xix. 29.—W. G. S.]—The words וְעַל הַמִּשְׁלָל and וְעַל הַמִּשְׁלָל refer to the instrument which we call a sundial, and which the ancients called a shadow-measurer (Plin. xxxvi. 15), because the hour of the day was estimated by the length of the shadow. It is evident from this that these instruments were not arranged by them as they are by us (see Martini, Von den Sonnenuhren der Alten, Leipzig, 1777, s. 35).

The מִשְׁלָל served to indicate the time. It is generally supposed that they were the degrees or lines (Vulg. lineae) of the scale on the indicator of the sun-dial. But מִשְׁלָל means a going up, an ascent, or that which ascends, hence a step (1 Kings x. 19; 2 Kings ix. 13), never a grade, a degree, or a line (see Knobel on Isai. xxxviii. 8). The Sept. always render it by ἀνὰβαθμῶν. The shadow-measurer must, therefore, have had steps like a pair of stairs. As it is called in ver. 10: "the steps of Ahaz;" it has often been supposed that it consisted of the stairs to the royal palace. Stairs, however, as distinguished from steps, were called מַעְרָבִית (Ezek. xl. 26), and why should the stairs of the royal palace, which had long been in their place, be called the stairs of Ahaz? It is evident that the shadow-measurer was an instrument by itself and not a part of the royal palace. It was "an arrangement contrived especially to measure the length of the shadow as a means of learning the hour" (The-nius). It is not possible now to say how it was contrived. Among the numerous guesses which have been made as to the mode of its construction (Winer, R.-W.-B. I. s. 498 sq.) the simplest and most natural seems to us to be that it was a column with circular steps surrounding it. "This column cast the shadow of its top at noon upon its uppermost, and morning and evening upon the lowest step, and thus designated the hour of the day" (Knobel). The prophet's question gives rise to the supposition that there were twenty of these steps, so that the shadow could go forward or backward ten degrees. "If the sign was given an hour before sunset then the shadow, returning ten degrees of a half-hour each, came back to the point at which it stood at noon" (Delitsch). It is impossible to draw any inference from this as to the division of hours among the Jews, for it is probable that they did not have any such division before the captivity (Winer, l. c. II. s. 560). The fact that the sun-dial was named after Ahaz is doubtless due to its having been first set up by him in the court of the palace. According to Herodotus (ii. 109) it was a Babylonian invention, and as the Babylonians were then in continual intercourse with the Assyrians, Ahaz may have become acquainted with it through the latter, just as he borrowed from them the plan of the new altar (xvi. 10). ["To them (the Assyrians) also is to be attributed the institution of the week of seven days, dedicated to the seven planetary bodies worshipped by them as divine beings, and the order assigned by them to the days has not been changed from time immemorial. Having invented the gnomon, they were the first to divide the day into twenty-four hours, the hours into sixty minutes, and the minutes into sixty seconds" (Lenormant I. 449). They had a sexagesimal system of notation (Chevallier, ibid.).]

Ver. 10. And Hezekiah answered: It is a light thing. Clericus thinks that Hezekiah answered the prophet's question non satis prudenter, for that it would be as difficult for the shadow to advance as to recede. But Starke observes correctly: "As the shadow, in the ordinary course of things, always advances and never recedes, the king chooses that which appears to be the more difficult in order that the proof may be the clearer." Full of his ardent wish that the shadow of death (Matt. iv. 16) may not extend any further, but may become shorter, he naturally chooses the latter movement for the shadow on the dial. And Isaiah the prophet cried unto the Lord, &c., ver. 11. Thenius arbitrarily asserts that "these words do not belong to history, but express the mode of conception prevalent at the time the history was written" [in other words, that Isaiah did not, as an actual matter of history, at this point in his conversation with the king, "cry to the Lord," but that the historian's idea of what a prophet would do under such circumstances was, that he would at this point cry to God, and that he accordingly inserted here a mention of Isaiah's having done so]. The prophets were accustomed, before giving a sign to confirm their utterances, to call upon God, because they knew, and every one else was to be taught, that the sign did not come from them but from God (1 Kings xvii. 20; xviii. 36; 2 Kings iv. 33; vi. 17; cf. John xi. 41). As in ver. 9 so also here in ver. 11, a movement forwards and backwards is ascribed, not to the sun but to the shadow. In this sign, all turned upon the shadow, not upon the sun. Thenius thinks that מַעְרָבִית must be supplied as a subject to יָרָךְ, because it is a feminine form, while שָׁל is masculine, but, in view of the variableness of the Hebrew genders, we cannot draw an inference from this feminine form which shall contradict the clear sense of the words (see Drechsler on Isai. xxxviii. 8). The account in Isaiah has instead of this verse: "Behold, I will bring again the shadow of the degrees, which is gone down in the sun-dial of Ahaz, ten degrees backward. So the sun returned ten degrees, by which degrees it was gone down;" but here also שָׁל must be understood as the subject of the first יָרָךְ, and, in the case of the second יָרָךְ, we must understand that the reference is not to any movement of the sun, but to a movement of the shadow caused by the sun. Drechsler correctly observes on the words: "And the sun turned backward:" "that is to say, of course, that the sunshine moved backwards on the indicator [better, the steps] on which it fell." (Cf. also Delitsch on Isai. xxxviii. 8.) The account in Kings is more detailed and more accurate than that in Isaiah, for the latter omits vers. 10 and 11, and mentions briefly, in vers. 21 and 22, after the thanksgiving of Hezekiah (xxxviii. 9-20), that which is here given in vers. 7 and 8, as if the figs had not been applied until after the מַעְרָבִית of Hezekiah.

[The story of the incident is complete without vers. 7-11. Hezekiah's recovery is mentioned in ver. 7, and it is a surprise to read in ver. 8 a request from him to be assured by a sign that he shall be healed. This lack of unity in the story seems to point to the fact that two independent traditions in regard to Hezekiah's illness are here combined. Unfortunately the account in Isaiah is also somewhat disjointed. Isai. xxxviii. 21 and 22 brings in the account of the king's recovery as a sort of supplement, or after thought. He there asks for a sign that he shall go to the temple on the third day, not, that he shall recover.—See further the bracketed addition to Histor. § 4—W. G. S.]

Ver. 12. At that time Berodach-baladan, &c. This took place "certainly not very soon after what is narrated above, for, at that time, news travelled slowly, and journeys took time" (The-nius), but it certainly was not as late as 703 [See Supplem. Note after the Ezek. section on chaps. xviii. and xix., and the similar Note after the present Ezek. section], as Knobel thinks, that is ten years after, for the ostensible object of the embassy was to congratulate the king on his recovery. מְרֹדַח stands for מְרֹדַח Isai. xxxix. 1. It is not an error, but simply an interchange of the labials, as in מְרֹדַח and מְרֹדַח. Merodach is really the name of the Babylonian Mars (Jerem. 1. 2). [See Ezreg. notes on xvi. 3; xvii. 16; 30 and 31.—Merodach belonged to the third rank of gods in the Babylonian Pantheon. This rank consisted of five gods representing the five planets. Merodach was equivalent to Jupiter, and was identified with the planet which we call by that name. He was one of the chief gods at Babylon and had two shrines (one mystic) in the great pyramid there. Nebuchadnezzar speaks of having adorned this pyramid and these shrines. Merodach was a secondary form or emanation of Bel (Baal). "He was called 'the ancient one of the gods, the supreme judge, the master of the horoscope'; he was represented as a man erect and walking, and with a naked sword in his hand." (Lenormant, I. 454 sq.)] It was the custom of the Babylonians and Assyrians to give their kings the names of divinities. Baladan is, according to the Aramaic, equivalent to מְרֹדַח. On the question whether this king was the Μαρκάμπανος in the Canon Ptol., who reigned twelve years, or the Merodach-baladan in the Chron. Armen. of Eusebius (Berosus), who only reigned six months, see Niebuhr, Gesch. Assyri. s. 40 and 75 sq., and Delitsch on Isai. xxxviii. 1. [See Suppl. Note at the end of this section.]—According to 2 Chron. xxxii. 31, the object of the embassy was, not only to congratulate Hezekiah on his recovery, but also to get information about the miracle, that is about the "sign" of the prophet. Evidently this was only the ostensible object; consequently Josephus does not mention it at all (Ant. x. 2, 2), but only gives the true one: σίμματα τε αὐτὸν εἶναι παρέχει καὶ φίλον. The kings of Babylon, who at that time were under the Assyrian supremacy, sought to free themselves from it. The present time, when Sennacherib had suffered a severe calamity, seemed to them to be the best opportunity. "The object of the embassy was to form an alliance with a king who had successfully resisted the Assyrian power" (Von Gerlach). Hence it follows that Hezekiah's illness fell in the time after and not before the Assyrian invasion. His recovery gave the king of Babylon the pretext he desired for sending an embassy. He did not care much to offer an empty congratulation. His object was, to "find out the strength of the kingdom of Judah" (Ewald). The ambassadors succeeded in inducing Hezekiah himself to give them full information in regard to this.—Ver. 13. And Hezekiah rejoiced on account of them, certainly not merely on account of their civility in coming to see him, and congratulate him, but also on account of the real object of their visit, which he easily perceived, even if they did not expressly make it known to him. An alliance with the Babylonians, whose power was then on the increase, seemed to him to be very advantageous to his kingdom, and to assure him against further danger from the Assyrians. He therefore showed them his treasury, his armory, &c., in order to show them that his means were not so entirely exhausted as might be expected after the Assyrian invasion. Drechsler justly remarks upon the enumeration of the different objects which follows, that "it lay in the interest of the narrator to enumerate as many as possible of these objects, in order to show that Hezekiah exerted himself to bring out and show everything which could set off his military strength and resources." First the treasury is mentioned, in which silver and gold were stored.

נֶכֶת is not to be connected with נֶכֶת (Gen. xxxvii. 25; xliii. 11) i. e., spice, especially the gum of the tragacanth which grows in Syria (why should the "spice-house" be mentioned first of all, before the silver and gold?). The word comes rather from the unused root נָכַת, equivalent to נָכַח: conceal, cover, preserve (see Fürst, s. v.), so that it means "treasure-house" or "store-house." The assumption that it was first used for storing spices, but then for storing gold and silver (Gesenius), is at least unnecessary. [The etymology suggested by Fürst and adopted by Bähr is very uncertain and improbable. It does not appear that נָכַח has the sense attributed to it. Gesenius' explanation is the best, and is the one almost universally adopted. נֶכֶת — נֶכֶת spice. The spice-house is the one used for storing spices—which were always reckoned as precious articles. The name then passed over to a store-house, or treasury, for precious articles of all sorts.—W. G. S.] נֶכֶת, perfume, the general expression for all objects which have a pleasant smell, which were used either for incense or for ointment, and which were highly esteemed. "At courts it was considered highly important to have a good stock of these" (Winer II. s. 495 sq.). The rabbis, whom Movers and Keil follow, say that שֶׁמֶן הַזַּיִת is not fine olive-oil, but balsam-oil manufactured from the products of the royal gardens. The armory which here stands in contrast with the treasury is without doubt the house of the forest of Lebanon (see notes on 1 Kings vii. 2). In all his dominion, i. e., "throughout the extent of his authority; not only in the royal castle, but throughout his kingdom" (Drechsler). It has been asked whence all these treasures came, since Hezekiah had to give up all his gold and silver to Sennacherib, and even to take off the gold coverings to the doorposts of the temple, which he had himself given in order to satisfy Sennacherib (chap. xviii. 14–16). The answer is not difficult. Sennacherib had only demanded gold and silver, not perfume, nor oil, nor even arms, and with these last Hezekiah had abundantly supplied himself at the approach of the Assyrians (2 Chron. xxxii. 5). The armory was therefore full, and the spices all remained. As for the silver and gold, it is evident from ver. 17 ("and that which thy fathers have laid up in store") that Hezekiah had not given up all, but still retained some of the ancient articles which had been handed down. He preferred to take the temple adornments which he himself had given, rather than to give up these articles which perhaps were hidden away in subterranean places of security. "The Chronicler also relates (II. xxxii. 23), in a credible manner, that, after the retreat of the Assyrians, many kings sent presents to Hezekiah" (Thenius). Finally, a great deal of booty may have been obtained from the camp of the Assyrians after their sudden flight, as Vitringa, Ewald, and Drechsler suggest. [See Suppl. Note after Ezreg. on chaps. xviii. and xix. The tribute given by Hezekiah

is there mentioned in detail, from the inscriptions.]

Ver. 14. Then came Isaiah the prophet unto king Hezekiah. Isaiah perceived the real object of the Babylonian embassy. He saw that the object was not merely to congratulate the king on his recovery and to satisfy their curiosity, but that they also desired to draw Hezekiah into an alliance, and he saw that the king was disposed to enter into one. He therefore felt himself impelled to go to the king and to call him to account. This he does by a question which, however, involves a strong affirmation: I know what has been done, but why hast thou done it? He desired a confession from the mouth of the king himself. As he had zealously protested before against any alliance with Egypt and Assyria, so he now warned the king against Babylon, and showed him what was to be apprehended from that quarter. Hezekiah's unembarrassed reply (ver. 15) shows that he supposed that he was doing right. "Hear," the prophet rejoins, "Jehovah's word" (ver. 16); thou hopest for help and deliverance from Babylon, but this very Babylon shall bring to thy kingdom and people ruin and destruction. These, to whom thou hast shown all that thou hast, will take away all this and more besides; they will take away even thy children and make them servants at their court. Ver. 18. That shall issue out of thee, that thou shalt beget—not his own sons, strictly speaking, but his descendants, a sense in which נָחֵם is so often used. Although כְּרִיתִים really means eunuchs, and although "the proper sting of the assertion in this verse is not to be unnecessarily blunted" (Drechsler), nevertheless we must not insist upon the literal force of the word, as Gesenius does, but understand by it foemen, or court attendants (1 Sam. viii. 15), as we see from the example of Daniel (Dan. i. 8), who was not a eunuch. There was humiliation enough in this prospect.

Ver. 19. Then said Hezekiah unto Isaiah.—He subjects himself in humility, and in submission to the will of God, and to the prophet's words, as Eli did, 1 Sam. iii. 13, cf. the same expression 1 Kings ii. 38, 42. כִּנֵּי cannot here mean kind (Umbreit), for the words in vers. 17 and 18 were not "kind;" nevertheless they were good in the fullest sense of the word, inasmuch as they were the words of God.—"They were such that there was no fault to be found with them" (Lange). Clericus remarks on the word; Bonum vocatur id, in quo acquiescere par est, quippe ab eo profectum, qui nihil facit, quod non tantum justissimum, sed quod summa bonitate non sit temperatum, etiam cum pœnas sumit. The second מָחָר shows that after the first part of the answer there was a pause, and that the following words were not addressed directly to Isaiah, although they were spoken before he went away; not, as Knobel thinks, after he was gone. מָחָר is strictly nonne? "The interrogative force is often lost, and it does not differ from הֲוֵי or הֲוֵיָהּ. See 1 Sam. xx. 37; 2 Sam. xv. 35; Job xxii. 12" (Gesenius). מָחָר is a particle of wishing (Ps. lxxxi. 8; cxxxix. 18). Calmet renders the sense thus: Iusta sunt omnia, quæcumque Deus sancivit, sed utinam coarceat ultionis suæ cursum, quamdiu vivo. This seems simpler and more natural than Keil's translation: "Is it not so, i.e., is it not pure goodness if peace and security are to last through my days (as long as I live)?" Instead of מָחָר we find in Isai. xxxix. 8, מָחָר, which is by no means to be preferred, for the translation: "For there will be peace" does not join on well to what precedes. According to Knobel מָחָר simply introduces the direct discourse. It is an error to translate, as is often done: "Very well! so long as there may only be peace and security in my time," and to take the words as an expression of "naïve" (Gesenius), or "easy" (Knobel), or "genuine oriental" (Hitzig) egotism, as if, as some of the rabbis indeed understand it (see Jerome on Isai. xxxix.), he did not trouble himself about his people. On the contrary, it is out of love for them that he does not wish to survive or see their destruction. His words are an expression of pain (Josephus: λυπηθεῖς), and not of easy selfishness. Drechsler and Keil understand מָחָר to refer to the "faithfulness of God, who keeps the covenant of grace which He has made with the humble," and Hitzig understands it of the faithfulness of men, "who keep the peace and observe treaties." But, as there is no reference here to peace with God (see vers. 17 and 18), so it cannot refer to His faithfulness, much less to that of the Babylonians, who, as yet, had made no treaty. מָחָר is rather a synonym of מָחָר, and signifies permanence, security. It cannot be understood otherwise in Jer. xxxiii. 6, where it stands in the same connection (cf. Jerem. xiv. 13). Vitringa: status rerum stabilis.

Ver. 20. And the rest of the acts, &c. In the notice of the close of Hezekiah's reign, vers. 20 and 21, we find inserted in the ordinary formula especial mention of his מְבִרָה (see Ezra. on 1 Kings xv. 23), and also of the aqueduct which he built, and which was of permanent utility to the city. The panegyric of Hezekiah in Sir. xlviii. 17, makes especial mention of the same. The reference is, of course, to the aqueduct which Hezekiah caused to be built at the approach of the Assyrians, and not to the one which is mentioned chap. xviii. 17 and Isai. vii. 3. According to 2 Chron. xxxii. 3 sq. all the fountains outside of the city walls, also Gihon and its pools, were covered over, in order, in case of siege, to deprive the besiegers of the use of the water. Then the water was all collected and led under-ground into the city, where it flowed into the pool called after Hezekiah, now more generally known as the Birket el Hamman. (See Thenius, in the appendix to his Commentar, s. 18. Winer, R.-W.-B. II. s. 563. Keil on 2 Kings xviii. 17.)—According to 2 Chron. xxxii. 33, Hezekiah was buried "on the hill-slope [E. V. is incorrect] of the graves of the sons [descendants] of David," i.e., he was not buried in the royal sepulchres. The additional remark: "And all Judah and the inhabitants of Jerusalem did him honor at his death," shows that he was not buried elsewhere than in the royal sepulchres through lack of respect, but probably through lack of room, or because he himself had chosen this place.

[SUPPLEMENTARY NOTE incorporating those results of Assyrian and Babylonian investigations which bear on the elucidation of chap. xx. As we saw in the Note at the end of the Ezra section on chaps. xviii. and xix., Rawlinson thinks that Sennacherib made two expeditions into Judah (or, at least, sent a second), in the year 700 or 698. Lenormant supposes that all the events mentioned occurred in one campaign, in 701-699. Hezekiah's sickness was of such a character (ver. 7) as to suggest a plague, the result of the Assyrian occupation. It occurred in 699 or 698. He, however, recovered. There can be no question that Hezekiah was in imminent danger of this kind at one time in his life, soon after the Assyrian invasion. As we shall see, below, the statement that his life was prolonged for fifteen years thereafter presents great difficulty. Rawlinson, although he puts Sennacherib's invasion in 700-698, puts Hezekiah's illness, and the visit of the Babylonians, in 713, on account of the biblical data. We must, however, accept the results of the investigations, and put the visit of the Babylonian ambassadors in 698-7. The sickness of the king was not an event of such a character as to be recorded in the history, if it were not for Isaiah's connection with it. On this account it was included at a later time, and, if it contains chronological statements which conflict with those which we find elsewhere, it is rather they than the others which must be disregarded. It is noticeable that the sickness is said to have occurred just in the middle of the king's reign, and, if the date were not well-known, and an arbitrary date had to be fixed upon by tradition, this is the one of all others which would be most likely to be chosen. Let us therefore disregard this statement rather than others, and put the king's illness in 698-7.

The world is always ready to worship success, without stopping to analyze it, and see on what it rests. Little Judah alone of the nations of Western Asia had escaped the Assyrians. It had not done so by virtue of its own strength, but by virtue of what must have appeared to the neighboring nations to be an accident. Nevertheless we find that an embassy came immediately afterwards, from Babylon, to form an alliance.

There was a king on the throne of Chaldea in 709 who is called Merodach Baladan, (Marduk-baladin) in the inscription called the "Acts of Sargon." Lenormant identifies him with the Kiniruz of Ptolemy's canon; but that king reigned earlier, and the identification with Mardocempalus (721-709), which Rawlinson adopts, seems better. In 709 Sargon totally defeated this king at Dur-Yakin, a town on the Euphrates below Babylon. Babylon became subject to Assyria. (It had been free since 760. Stapp. Note on chap. xv.) The defeated king either escaped in disguise or was taken prisoner; the inscription says one thing in one place and another in another. When we next meet with the same name, it is, therefore, doubtful whether it is the same person or his son. Merodach Baladan at any rate proved himself a patriotic Babylonian, and a determined foe of the Assyrians. Immediately after Sargon's assassination, in 704, Babylon revolted under Agises, but Merodach Baladan killed him, and himself took command (Lenormant). Sennacherib mentions, in his inscription, that his first campaign was against Merodach Baladan, and the armies of Elam, which were allied with him. He defeated and plundered them, spoiled Chaldea, and put a vassal king over it (703). While Sennacherib was engaged in Syria, Philistia, and Judah (see Stapp. Notes on chaps. xvi., xvii., xviii. and xix.) Merodach Baladan escaped from prison, raised another revolt, and expelled the vassal king. Sennacherib, after his disaster in Judah, turned once more against Chaldea. It was now that Merodach Baladan sent to Hezekiah to try to form an alliance. Hezekiah was flattered by this and made a show of his treasures. He probably did not want the Babylonians to think that, after all, he was not an ally worth having. The result proved the justice of the prophet's warning. Merodach Baladan was again defeated. He died in exile soon after, and Chaldea was once more subjugated. Sennacherib set his son Asshur-nadin on the throne.

Some years of peace followed, during which Sennacherib was rebuilding Nineveh, which he did with great magnificence. But in 693, on the death of Asshur-nadin, Babylon once more revolted. For the next ten years Sennacherib was occupied in suppressing a series of fierce but unsuccessful revolts in Babylon, and in prosecuting wars in Elam and Susiana to punish the allies of the rebels. In 682 he made his son Esarhaddon viceroy of Babylon, having chastised the city with such severity as to leave it half-ruined. He was assassinated in 680 (Lenormant).

To return to Hezekiah. If he lived fifteen years after his illness, he died in 685, and reigned forty-two (not twenty-nine) years. Lenormant adopts this opinion, and adjusts other data to it thus: Manasseh was born in 797. He was recognized as king from his birth. The twenty-nine years of Hezekiah are reckoned to this time, and the fifty-five of Manasseh from it. Hezekiah died in 685, when Manasseh was twelve years old. Aside from the violence of this theory, it encounters numerous specific objections, and cannot be adopted. It is more reasonable to hold fast the twenty-nine years for Hezekiah's reign, and sacrifice the fifteen years stated as his new lease of life. See the first paragraph above. Hezekiah died in 698-7, and Manasseh was twelve years old at that time.—See Note 30 on the Chronolog. Table at the end of the volume.—W. G. S.]

HISTORICAL AND ETHICAL.

1. The story of the illness of Hezekiah "withdraws our attention from the external history of the kingdom, which is narrated in the foregoing chapters, and reveals to us the soul of the king. It leads us out of the city into the royal palace" (Umbreit). The announcement of his approaching death shocked him deeply; he turned away from those who surrounded him, and "wept sore," as if death were the end of all. What has become of his firm faith? Where is the fearless confidence with which a pious man faces death? Does this not seem like unmanly weakness, and like anything but submission to the will of God? But there are two things to be considered in explanation. Hezekiah had passed his whole life up to this point in anxiety and trouble; he had only just escaped a danger which threatened his kingdom and his life; he was now, for the first time, in a position to look forward with courage and hope to a period of peace, rest, and prosperity, and to the opportunity of doing more for his country than he had hitherto been able to do. At this time, now, in the very prime of life, he was suddenly called to die and to give up all. He had succeeded to the throne in a time of deep decay, and had sought in every way to restore prosperity and strength, and now, when he was in a position to labor for this end with some success, he must leave all. Nothing could be more natural than that he, a man of warm and earnest feelings, from whom no stoical apathy was to be expected, should be terrified and shocked when he heard the prophet's words: Thou shalt die! He does not murmur or complain, still less does he, like Ahaziah (2 Kings i. 4-9), burst out in anger against the messenger of death. Neither does he simply resign himself; he bows humbly and pours out his grief in prayer to Him in whom he believed. Therefore his prayer finds an answer, which it never would have done if it had been made in womanish weakness or in that love of life which is displeasing to God. The fulfilment of his prayer is a proof that it was offered in a right spirit. The prayer came from a faithful, noble, and pious heart, as we see from his hymn of thanksgiving, Isai. xxxviii. 9-20. He had in mind the words, Ps. cxlv. 18 and 19. In the second place it is to be remembered that Hezekiah belonged to the pious men of the Old Testament, who had not that hope and confidence which belongs to those who know Him who has conquered death; that he had never heard the words: "Thanks be to God who giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ" (1 Cor. xv. 57). The promises in the Old Testament economy all refer to this life and to the bliss of communion with the living God. Death had not yet lost its sting. Hence the terror with which even the pious men of the Old Testament looked forward to it, while the pious men of the New Covenant look up in full confidence to Him who has robbed death of its power, and in Whom all promises are yea and amen.

2. Hezekiah's prayer has been interpreted as "self praise," on account of the appeal which it contains to his righteous life (Thenius), and the ridiculous assertion has been made that "the Church, at least the Protestant Church, must, according to its standards, class him among the self-righteous" (Menzel). It is entirely left out of view, in this judgment, that Hezekiah stood in the economy of the Old Testament, that is, in the economy of legal righteousness; that the entire revelation of the Old Testament is concentrated in the Law of Moses, as that of the New Testament is concentrated in the Gospel; and that to walk according to this Law is not to be virtuous, morally pure, and free from sin, but to serve Jehovah as the only God, to fear Him, to trust Him, and to love Him with all the heart (Deut. vi. 1-5). Hezekiah did not know any more about the modern doctrine that a man should practise virtue simply for the sake of virtue, than he did about the evangelical doctrine that faith alone, without works, ensures salvation. He considered that death, which was announced to him, was a penalty inflicted by God, and he did not know how he had incurred it, since he had always endeavored to serve God to the best of his knowledge and conscience, and never had departed from Him. He comes before the judge of life and death and begs Him not to remember his sins alone, but also to remember that he has feared and worshipped Him. He could say all this without pharisaical "self-praise" (Luke xviii. 9-12), just as well as St. Paul could say, without self-righteousness: "I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith" (2 Tim. iv. 7). The whole thanksgiving hymn, Isai. xxxviii., breathes humility before the Almighty and Holy One; there is not a hint of self-praise or of holiness by works in it. "Thou hast in love to my soul delivered it from the pit of corruption; for thou hast cast all my sins behind thy back" (Isai. xxxviii. 17). His greatest cause for grief was that he must go thither where he could no longer praise the Lord. Would that all who consider themselves virtuous and holy would show themselves as humble and penitent in the face of death as Hezekiah did.

[It cannot be denied that there is a great deal of special pleading in this criticism of Hezekiah's words. We have to be on our guard against setting out with a determination to see nothing but good in certain of these characters, and nothing but evil in certain others, and against warping facts to suit this foregone judgment, most of all, if "good" or "evil" are to be measured by modern standards. When Hezekiah says that he has walked before God with a perfect heart, and in fidelity, he refers to the requirements of the Mosaic Law, but when he says: "I have done good in thy sight," he means moral good—righteousness. He claims, in perfect honesty and simplicity, that he has done what is right. The answer to those who accuse him of self-praise is not to be found in twisting the words. Two things may be urged in answer, both of which are true as general principles, and are not suggested by the desire of establishing the saintliness of Hezekiah's character. The first is that, if he had really done what was right as far as he knew, and if his theology taught him that this calamity was a punishment which indicated that he had been doing wrong, then he had a full right to appeal to his conduct against this theological inference (cf. the argument of Eliphaz, Job iv. 5, particularly chap. iv. 7, and Job's answer, in which he justifies himself. See chap. xiii. 15, 23). Secondly: the naive expression of Hezekiah, who thinks that he has done right and says so, is not to be judged by the modern mock-humility which often thinks that it has done right, and says that it has not; which assents to the doctrine that all have sinned, as a general theological proposition, while the individual who repeats it does not see, in his heart, that he has sinned after all. The Jewish theology taught that temporal calamities were judgments of God inflicted in punishment for sin. Hence it was inferred that a man who suffered misfortune must have sinned (Isai. liii. 4). Hezekiah had attempted to do right to the best of his ability. His conscience told him that he had been faithful to this effort, and in all truth and simplicity he expressed this conviction. It is evident that it is impertinent to judge any such naive and truthful expression by our conventional modern standards of how much a man may be allowed to express of the sincere convictions of his heart, when they bear upon his own merits or abilities.—W. G. S.]

3. The prophet Isaiah here "meets us once more in all the glory of the prophetic dignity" (Umbreit). His conduct is based upon the premise of his prophetic character, without which it would be obscure and enigmatical. What he does and says, he does and says not in his own power, but as one who "stands before Jehovah" (1 Kings xvii. 1), and who is set "over nations and kingdoms to root out and to pull down and to destroy, to throw down, to build and to plant" (Jerem. i. 10). Mighty in word and deed, without fear of men or anxiety to please them, he threatens, and warns, and exhorts, and helps. He undertakes without hesitation the duty, heavy for him no doubt, of going into the palace to announce to his sovereign the terrible command: "Set thine house in order." Then he retires, leaving the king to the effects of this command, but soon returns and declares to the crushed monarch, who is absorbed in anxious prayer, the fulfilment of that prayer, the promise of complete and speedy recovery, nay even of a reign prolonged for as many years more as it had already lasted, and the protection of God throughout this time. What would become of the prophet if he did all this in obedience to his mere human judgment? According to the ordinary custom of the prophets (see 1 Kings xvii. Hist. § 6; Pt. II. pp. 17, 47, 58) he combines with the promise of recovery the use of an external means of healing. The cluster of figs here had just the same function as the means used by our Lord (John ix. 6, 14). It was not the cluster of figs which helped the man at the point of death, but the Almighty Lord of life and death. The ordinary means of healing was here a sign and pledge of the promised cure. As the Berleburger Bibel says: "Since this means could not have the power of curing in itself, it was used as a sign of the divine superhuman power." Isaiah did not employ the ordinary, natural means until he was sure of the divine help. It was just because this means of cure was the ordinary natural one, that Hezekiah wanted a "sign" that Jehovah would heal him (ver. 8), and did not have complete confidence in this remedy. It is, therefore, utterly erroneous to ascribe Hezekiah's cure to the cluster of figs, to talk about Isaiah's knowledge of medicine, and to draw the inference that the prophets were accustomed to act as "physicians" (Knobel, Der Prophet der Hebr. I. s. 55. Winer, R.-W.-B. II. s. 280). If the prophet had, as a physician, been sure of the efficacy of this remedy, he would have behaved in the most reprehensible manner in not applying it at once, and in beginning by announcing certain death.

4. The sign, which was granted to Hezekiah at his request, has intimate analogy with the prophetic declaration which it was intended to confirm. There could hardly be a more significant sign than one presented on the shadow-measurer, that is, the time-measurer, which was "arranged in the court of the palace before the king's windows" (Thenius). Every human life is like a day—it has its morning, its noon, and its evening, (Eccl. xi. 6; xii. 1, 2; Job xi. 17; Matt. 20. 3, sq.). The advance of the shadow shows the approach of evening (Jer. vi. 4; Job vii. 1, 2), which will be followed by darkness and night. Hezekiah's life-day was on the decline; the night of death was approaching; then it was promised him this day should stand once more at its noon, that the shadow of death should recede, and that the evening should once more become mid-day. The sign is not therefore "a mere pledge of the fulfilment of the promise in vers. 5 and 6," in which "there is no analogy to be traced with the fact of the prolongation of his life" (Thenius). On the contrary, its significance is so apparent that it is difficult not to see it at once. This is not a mere trick of art or power, in place of which any other one might just as well have been chosen, any more than any of the other prophetic signs.—As for the physical features of the sign, many, starting from the supposition that a "violation of the order of the solar system" (Menzel), a miracle which involved the revolution of the earth on its axis in a direction contrary to its regular one, is here recorded, have been shocked and repelled, and have either sought to explain it naturally, or have characterized it as a myth. The old naturalistic explanations by a second-sun, a vapor cloud, or an earthquake (see Winer, R.-W.-B. I. s. 499), may all be passed over as antiquated. We need only take notice here of the two most recent attempts. According to Gumpach (Alttestam. Studien, I. s. 195 sq.), Isaiah turned about the foot of the index, which before was towards the East, so that the shadow, instead of running down, as before, would descend [ascend?]. In that case, however, the sign would be nothing but "a very simple trick" (Oehler), and the greatest prophet of the Old Testament would be nothing but a common juggler. This trivial hypothesis falls to the ground with the erroneous, at least unproven assumption, that the shadow-measurer had a gnomon with a foot-piece. According to Thenius, we have to understand that there was "a partial eclipse of the sun, unnoticed by most men." Such an one occurred, according to Prof. Seyfarth's communication to Thenius, on the 26th of Sept., 713, B.C., "which date is in perfect consistency with all the other chronological statements of the Book of Kings." He adds that during such an eclipse "a slight advance and recession of the shadow takes place." "Isaiah made use of his astronomical knowledge to give the king, in his despair, a sign which should re-arouse his courage." This explanation, which no one else has yet adopted,—[Stanley (II. 537) says it is the only thing which could "illustrate" the cause of the phenomenon. He adds that he is informed that the variation would be almost imperceptible except to a scientific observer.]—rests upon the very doubtful assumption [?] that there was a partial eclipse of the sun in the year 713, and upon the still more doubtful assumption that Isaiah had great astronomical knowledge, and knew how to make shrewd use of it upon occasion. It is, therefore, a most unfortunate attempt. Let us have done with attempts to explain facts and events, which the historian distinctly declares to be miracles, by naturalistic hypotheses. Modern criticism does not indeed any longer deny that a miracle is here recorded, but disposes of it as a myth, and asserts either that a natural event was at a later time exaggerated and embellished with miraculous details, or that this story grew up through tradition out of the simple promise of the prophet, that, as the sun, after going down, returns and repeats its course, so Hezekiah's life should, though it had reached its limit, take a new start, and go on for a time longer (Knobel, Hitzig). Ewald's notion amounts to the same thing. He says: "It must not be overlooked that this story was not written down, in its present form, until twenty years or more after the event, and after the death of Hezekiah and of Isaiah. Isaiah's good influence in this incident, even on the domestic life of the good prince, stands firm as an historical fact, and his words of trust and consolation no doubt miraculously (!) encouraged the king." In this way, it is true, we glide most easily over all difficulties. But it is a purely self-willed assumption, which has no foundation save dislike for everything miraculous, that this story was not recorded in its present form until twenty years after the event, and that it is a product of tradition. The two records of it are, in the main points, identical. Both are taken, as was shown above, from an older authority, with which we are not acquainted, and of which we cannot assert that it was first written years after the death of Hezekiah and Isaiah, at a time when tradition had already converted the history of this incident into a myth. The Chronicler also, although his record is very brief, speaks of a מִוֶּלֶדֶת (2 Chron. xxxii. 24). Critical science first exaggerates the miracle, and makes of it an event which would produce a cataclysm on earth, in order to have so much more ground for declaring it a myth. But there is no hint of any such event in the text. The miracle "was not visible everywhere, but only in Jerusalem," and "since it is a case of a sign which was to serve as a pledge, and did not need to be supernatural, it was accomplished by a phenomenon of refraction in the rays of light" (Keil), "for it is sufficient that the shadow, which in the afternoon was below, by a sudden refraction should be bent upwards" (Delitsch). There are "certain weak analogies in the natural course of nature, as, for instance, the phenomenon cited by many expositors, which occurred in the year 1703, at Metz, in Lothringia, and which was observed by the prior of the Monastery there, P. Romuald, and many others, that the shadow on a sun-dial receded an hour and a half" (Keil).

[Bosanquet, in an Essay published in the Journal of the Royal Asiatic Soc., Vol. XV., offers a solution of this phenomenon from the features of an eclipse. This eclipse took place in the year 689, on the 11th of January. He founds upon this an argument that that must have been the year of Hezekiah's sickness, but this argument has not been considered conclusive as against other data. We mention it here only as a proffered explanation of the manner in which such a phenomenon might have been perceived, without involving a reversed motion of the earth. For a few days before and after the winter solstice, the sun's altitude at noon at Jerusalem is about 34°. If the "steps of Ahaz" were a flight of steps in the palace court mounting from north to south, at an angle of about 34°, then the sun would throw a shadow down them at noon which would just tip the top step. The upper limb of the sun would alone rise above the object (a roof, for instance) which threw the shadow. If the upper limb were eclipsed, the moon, in passing over the sun's disk, would cut off the sunlight, and the shadow would once more descend the stairs. As the moon passed away the sunlight would once more pass below it and above the roof, and once more light the whole stair. The same explanation would apply to the dial if it were a small stair-like instrument, used for measuring time. An eclipse, to accomplish what is here supposed, must be nearly total, must be on the upper limb of the sun, must occur within twenty days of the winter solstice, and at noon of the day. Any contribution, in the way of explanation, ought to be carefully considered, but there are grave objections to this one. (a) The date of the eclipse, which is found to satisfy the conditions tolerably well, is irreconcilable with other data. (b) The phenomenon would be very slight, and only noticeable to careful observation, or under the most marvellous concatenation of circumstances. (c) It can hardly be believed, after reading the text, that the king had seen the shadow abnormally recede, and that the "miracle" consisted in its returning to its regular and proper place and motion.—W. G. S.]

5. The narrative of the embassy of the king of Babylon to Hezekiah hinges upon the prophecy of Isaiah, in which, for the first time, the downfall of the kingdom of Judah and the Babylonian captivity are foretold. This incident, like the two previous ones, is recorded in the book of Isaiah on account of his prophecies, which form the kernel of each. Hezekiah's behavior, it is true, occasioned the prophecy, but the prophecy is the main thing, and it throws the proper light upon his conduct. Drechsler: "Evidently the arrival of these ambassadors flattered Hezekiah's vanity so much that he forgot the rules of ordinary prudence." Umbreit: "Hardly has the king escaped death and won a new lease of life, and found the treasure in heaven, before his heart is once more set upon the treasure of earth, where moth and rust doth corrupt. Instead of making known to the ambassadors the glory of God, he shows them, boastfully, the perishable riches of his palace." Hezekiah, according to the prevailing opinion of the commentators, shows his treasures out of boastfulness and love of display, and hence the "bold moral preacher" (Köster), the prophet, pronounced to him the fitting rebuke, and announced the coming punishment. But this conception is certainly erroneous. There is no sign of love of display or of vanity in anything which is recorded of Hezekiah. Drechsler himself exclaims: "What a contrast to the tone of Isai. xxxviii.!" This very contrast is an argument against the above conception of the disposition in which Hezekiah acted. A proud and vain man would have answered the prophet, when he called him to account, in a very different manner, and would not have expressed himself so openly and unembarrassedly as Hezekiah does in ver. 15. His further reply in ver. 18 bears witness to anything but a haughty and vain character. But even supposing that he had been influenced by vanity on this occasion, this momentaneous weakness would be terribly punished by the threat of the loss of his kingdom. This threatened punishment would be of all proportion to the fault, and would be tyrannical and oppressive. Thenius justly says: "Hezekiah's conduct towards the ambassadors did not proceed from vanity or love of display (Knobel). . . . He accepted with joy the offered alliance of the Babylonians in the hope of avenging (?) himself, and he showed them the extent of his resources in order to convince them that he would be no contemptible ally (Clericus)." In this, however, he had, on the one hand, departed from complete trust in God alone; and, on the other hand, he had lost sight of the ordinary dictates of prudence to an extent which must ultimately be ruinous to Judah and Jerusalem. The prophet's rebuke was meant to make him see this, and that must also be the sense of the Chronicler's brief notice (II., xxxii. 25), that Hezekiah "trusted too much to his own power." The occasion of the prophet's rebuke, and the thing which called for punishment, was not the personal vanity of Hezekiah, but the fact that he, who had experienced such signal instances of Jehovah's power and willingness to save, and who had been so often warned against all complications with heathen nations, should enter with joy into an alliance with Babylon. This was a sin which was not to be expected in him, a sin against the theocratic and soteriological destiny of Israel.

6. The prophet Isaiah appears here also in all his prophetic majesty, although seen from a different side from before. There he appeared as a consoler, here as a messenger of the divine judgment. The latter, as well as the former, character belongs to the prophetic calling. The message announces the destruction, in the first place, of Hezekiah and his family, but then, by implication, that of the entire nation. "Not that the exile was inflicted as a punishment for this fault of Hezekiah" (Delitsch), but because the whole nation had incurred, though in a far higher degree, the same guilt as Hezekiah against the theocratic relationship to God, and was about to incur it still further, so that the measure would become full, and then the punishment threatened in the Law (Levit. xxvi. 33; Deut. iv. 27; xxviii. 36, 64) must fall. "The Babylonian Captivity," observes Starke on Isai. xxxix. 6, "would have taken place, even if Hezekiah had never committed this sin, but it would not have been foretold at this time, if this incident of the ambassadors had not occurred. It was meant, at the same time, to be a humiliation of Hezekiah on account of his fault." He received the prophet's announcement as such a humiliation, and hence he was spared the trial of himself experiencing the exile.

On account of the definiteness of the prediction, modern critical scholars have asserted that it is an oraculum post eventum, which originated with the historian (Knobel), or, at least, that the actual fulfillment determined "the light in which the prediction is set before us" (Ewald). [What he means is, that this historian, who had lived through, and been an eye-witness of, the capture of Jerusalem by the Babylonians, lends sharpness of outline and accuracy of detail to the picture, when he tells us how Isaiah had once foretold all this.] This, however, takes away the point from the whole story. It is true that "political sagacity might foresee the unfortunate consequences of Hezekiah's thoughtless conduct, but without prophetic inspiration it was impossible to foresee that Babylon, which was just struggling for independence, would supplant Assyria as the great world-monarchy, and that Babylon, and not Assyria, which was then threatening rebellious Judah, would really inflict the extremest woes upon her" (Delitsch). The definite reference to Babel, which is the thing that offends critical science, forms the point of prophecy. It was occasioned by the embassy from Babylon, and it is intended to signify to Hezekiah: This very Babylon, from which thou hopest to obtain help and support, will ruin thy nation and people. Isaiah does not appear here as a sagacious statesman any more than he appeared in the former incident as a skillful physician, or a learned astronomer. His words have not the form of wise advice, but of a divine sentence of condemnation. Their form, therefore, would be inexcusable, if the prophet was only expressing his personal misgivings and his human anticipations. Why shall he be made out to be everything possible, physician, astronomer, statesman, only not that which he claimed to be, and which he was, viz., a prophet, who spake as he was "inspired by the Holy Ghost" (2 Peter i. 21)?

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL

Vers. 1-11. Hezekiah's Illness "unto Death" and his Recovery from the same.—WERT. SUMM.: God sends illness upon the good, not in punishment for sins past, but as a trial of their faith and patience (Rom. v. 3) . . . or for His own glory (John ix. 3; xi. 4). By observing this we may the better possess our souls in patience (Luke xxi. 19).—CRAMER: Bodily illnesses are the forerunners of death, and God's means for fostering the health of the soul.—STARKE: God lays upon his children first one evil and then another. Hezekiah is first delivered from Sennacherib and the hands of man, and then he falls into the hands of God, who had before delivered him.—VER. 1. HALL: Teachers and preachers must not conceal disagreeable truths from men, but make them known, whether they will be pleasant or not.—STARKE: We see, from the example of Isaiah, what is the duty of physicians and preachers towards the sick, viz., not to encourage them by false hopes of recovery, but at the right time to point out to them the duty of setting their house in order, and preparing themselves for death.—THE SAME: The rich and great should also be warned to prepare for death.—It is a great mercy of God to allow us to foresee our approaching end (Deut. xxxii. 48 sq.).—Every illness, even though it does not seem likely to be fatal, is a warning to prepare for death, a memento mori, which can harm no one, whereas it is very harmful if all thoughts of death and eternity are held far away. He who, in his days of health, thinks upon death, and faithfully believes in Him who has overcome death, is not terrified when he is commanded to set his house in order.—KREUZ: Set thy house in order, O man! If thou hast no house, thou hast at least a soul. Prepare it as best thou mayest for death, for thou knowest not whether to-day or to-morrow thou wilt be called upon to quit this tabernacle. It is vain, however, to attempt to fit a soul for death by a sacrament, if it has not during its time of health and labor sanctified itself by holy deeds and by communion with God. How peacefully one may die, in spite of shrinking nature, if one can only say to God, as Hezekiah did: Thou knowest that I have walked faithfully before Thee.—As it is wise, in time of health and strength, to set one's house in order in a worldly sense, that is, to make one's will and arrange one's affairs, so is it still more wise to set one's house in order in a spiritual sense, and not to put off making one's peace with God until one stands on the brink of the grave.—Vers. 2 and 3. Hezekiah's Behavior at the Announcement of his Approaching Death. (a) He turned his face to the wall, that is, he turned away from all things earthly and temporal, to collect his thoughts. (b) He prayed to the Lord, that is, he sought refuge in Him alone. That is what we also should do in every illness.—STARKE: It promotes devotion to make one's prayers in secret and alone.—THE SAME: Children of God should not murmur when they are scourged of God, but kiss the rod (Micah

vii. 9; 1 Sam. iii. 18).—Fear of Death, its Cause, and how it may be overcome.—The wish of a dying man to live longer is not wicked, if it comes from the sentiment: si diutius vivam, Deo vivam, and has not its origin in the desire to enjoy the world and life a little longer. Paul desired to depart and be with Christ, but he admits that longer life enables one to bear more fruit (Phil. i. 21 and 22). "Let me live that I may serve thee; let me die that I may possess thee." Hezekiah's prayer in view of death did not come from a proud and self-righteous heart, but from a humble and penitent one. He based his prayer upon the promise which God had given to the faithful under the old covenant: Do this and thou shalt live (Luke x. 28; Levit. xviii. 5; Prov. x. 27). Therefore he was heard by God, Who resisteth the proud, but giveth grace unto the humble. So should we also, in the face of death, not console ourselves with our own righteousness and virtue, but build our hopes upon the promises which He has given us in the New Testament, and upon Him through whom our sins are forgiven. He that believeth in Him, though he were dead yet shall he live (Rom. x. 4; John xi. 25 sq.).—Vers. 4-6. The prayer of the righteous is very effectual when it is earnest (James v. 16; Ps. cxlv. 18; Sir. xxxv. 21; Isai. lxxv. 24; xxx. 19).—The word of consolation to all who cry to the Lord with tears in sorrow and distress: "I have heard thy prayer, I have seen thy tears."—How consoling to think that the length or the shortness of our days is in God's hand (Sir. xi. 14). "From sudden death, good Lord, deliver us."—CRAMER: The Lord always gives more than we pray for; the king prays for life, and He gives him long life (Ps. xxi. 5). Moreover, He promises him protection against Assyria, for He can do far more (Eph. iii. 20).—"Thou shalt go up into the house of the Lord." This was not a command, but a fulfilment of a wish and prayer, and it shows that Hezekiah loved the place where God's honor dwelt (Ps. xxvi. 8; xxvii. 4).—The first steps after recovery should be to the house of God, to thank Him for restored health (Ps. lxxvi. 12-14).—Ver. 7. The fact that God connected the healing of the king with the use of a certain remedy shows that we should not despise the means of healing, which are His gift, but should join the use of them with our prayers to Him (Sir. xxxviii. 1-4).—The Lord is the true physician, for it is He who either gives or denies efficacy to human remedies. One is relieved by the slightest remedy; for another the best and strongest is of no avail.—Ver. 8. CRAMER: God treats us like a good physician, not only as regards our bodies, but also as regards our souls. As the physician puts a staff in the hands of a yet feeble convalescent, so God grants to Hezekiah a "sign" as a staff for his faith (Isai. xlii. 3). So nowadays God grants the sacraments as means of strengthening our faith.—In the Old Covenant God gave many signs, in the New Covenant only one—Christ, the Sign of all signs. Therefore we should ask no other. When the Pharisees demanded a sign, Our Lord said: "O wicked and adulterous generation," &c. (Matt. xii. 38 sq.). The sign for all time is that He was dead and liveth again to all eternity, and holds the keys of death and hell. All signs, as well as all promises, are in Him yea and amen.—Vers. 9-11. God alone controls the index on the dial of life; to turn it forwards or backwards is the prerogative of His might and grace. Therefore, submit to His will, and say: "It is the Lord, let Him do what seemeth Him good" (1 Sam. iii. 18).

Vers. 12-19. The Embassy of the King of Babylon to Isaiah. (a) Hezekiah's conduct towards it; (b) what Isaiah declared to him on account of his reception of it (see Histor. § 6).—STARKE: The most grievous calamities are not as ruinous as the flatteries of the children of the world.—KYBURZ: In the storm Hezekiah was preserved; in the sunshine he was lost.—J. LANGE: It may well come to pass that a man who has bravely withstood a great trial falls under a slight one. Let him that standeth take heed lest he fall. The world nowadays often behaves as the king of Babylon did, for he did not care so much to make known by his embassy and gifts his sincere respect for Hezekiah, as he did to secure his alliance for his own advantage, and so secure his own ends (cf. Sir. vi. 6-9).—Ver. 13. PFAFF. BIEBL: We should not be too friendly with the enemies of the Lord, especially when they may misuse our friendship to our disadvantage. Friendship with the world is enmity to God; he who wishes to be a friend to the world becomes an enemy to God (James iv. 4).—The desire of making a display, and of infusing a high opinion of one's self into others, is often found even in those who are true Christians, and who have borne hard tests with success. Thus vanity clings to us and is the first thing and the last which we have to conquer in following Our Lord. Therefore watch and pray. The spirit indeed is willing but the flesh is weak. The Saviour said: "He that will follow me," &c. (Luke xiv. 33).—KYBURZ: We still show our spiritual treasures to the friends from Babylon, especially when we admire our own gifts, and like to have others admire them. As soon as strangers arrive we hasten to show our gifts, and powers, and accomplishments, in order to win respect. This is just the way to lose all those things. If one collects treasures let him store them up in heaven, where no spies will come to see them.—Ver. 14. It is a proof that He who watches over our souls is a good shepherd that he sees when we are about to depart from Him, or to transgress, and sends one of His faithful servants, or some faithful friend, to warn us, and to say: "Hear the word of the Lord!" Is such a friend always welcome to thee?—Ver. 15. He who denies his fault will never succeed in concealing it; he who confesses it will find pity (Prov. xxviii. 13; cf. 1 Chron. xxx. 17).—Vers. 17-19. ROOS: Worldly people, with whom a child of God thoughtlessly mingles, do him great harm. Happy is he who is set right again after every transgression by a word from God, as Hezekiah was! It is the just sentence of God that the staff in which we trusted becomes a rod for our punishment.—Ver. 19. From the example of Hezekiah we learn, when the word of God rebukes our vanity and love of display, our vacillation and our want of faith, to bow in submission and to say: "Good is the word of the Lord which thou hast spoken;" when we have shown true penitence, then we may also pray: Da pacem, Domine, in diebus nostris!

SECOND SECTION.

THE MONARCHY UNDER MANASSEH, AMON, AND JOSIAH.

(CHAPS. XXI.-XXIII. 30.)

A.—The Reigns of Manasseh and Amon.

CHAP. XXI. 1-26. (2 CHRON. XXXIII.)

- 1 MANASSEH was twelve years old when he began to reign, and reigned fifty 2 and five years in Jerusalem. And his mother's name was Hephzi-bah. And he did that which was evil in the sight of the Lord, after the abominations of the 3 heathen, whom the Lord cast out before the children of Israel. For he built up again the high places which Hezekiah his father had destroyed; and he reared up altars for Baal, and made a grove [an Astarte-image], as did Ahab king of 4 Israel; and worshipped all the host of heaven, and served them. And he built altars in the house of the Lord, of which¹ the Lord said, In Jerusalem will I 5 put my name. And he built altars for all the host of heaven in the two courts
 6 of the house of the Lord. And [omits] And he [He also] made his son pass through the fire, and observed times [practised sooth-saying], and used enchantments, and dealt with familiar spirits and wizards [patronized necromancers and wizards]²: he wrought much wickedness in the sight of the Lord, to pro-7 voke him to anger.³ And he set a graven image [copy] of the grove [Astarteimage] that he had made in the house, of which the Lord said to David, and to Solomon his son, In this house, and in Jerusalem, which I have chosen out of 8 all the tribes of Israel, will I put my name forever: Neither will I make the feet of Israel move [wander] any more out of the land which I gave their fathers; [,] only [omits] only if they will [only]⁴ observe [take care] to do according to all that I have commanded them, and according to all the law that my 9 servant Moses commanded them.⁵ But they hearkened not: and Manasseh seduced them to do more evil than did the nations whom the Lord destroyed before the children of Israel.
- 10 And the Lord spake by his servants the prophets, saying, Because Man-11 asseh king of Judah hath done these abominations, and hath done wickedly above all that the Amorites did, which were before him, and hath made Judah 12 also to sin with his idols: Therefore thus saith the Lord God of Israel, Behold, I am bringing such evil upon Jerusalem and Judah, that whosoever heareth of 13 it,⁶ both his ears shall tingle. And I will stretch over Jerusalem the line of Samaria, and the plummet of the house of Ahab; and I will wipe [out] Jerusalem as a man wipeth a dish, wiping it, and turning it upside down [—he 14 wipeth it and turneth it upside down].⁷ And I will forsake [throw away] the remnant of mine inheritance, and deliver them into the hand of their enemies; 15 and they shall become a prey and a spoil to all their enemies; Because they have done that which was evil in my sight, and have provoked me to anger, since the day their fathers came forth out of Egypt, even unto this day.
- 16 Moreover Manasseh shed innocent blood very much, till he had filled Jerusalem from one end to another; besides his sin wherewith he made Judah to sin, in doing that which was evil in the sight of the Lord.
- 17 Now the rest of the acts of Manasseh, and all that he did, and his sin that he sinned, are they not written in the book of the Chronicles of the kings

- 18 of Judah? And Manasseh slept with his fathers, and was buried in the garden of his own house, in the garden of Uzza: and Amon his son reigned in his stead.
- 19 Amon was twenty and two years old when he began to reign, and he reigned two years in Jerusalem. And his mother's name was Meshullemeth, the daughter of Haruz of Jotbah. And he did that which was evil in the sight of the Lord, as his father Manasseh did. And he walked in all the way that his father walked in, and served the idols that his father served, and worshipped them:
- 22 And he forsook the Lord God of his fathers, and walked not in the way of the Lord. And the servants of Amon conspired against him, and slew the king in his own house. And the people of the land slew all them that had conspired against king Amon; and the people of the land made Josiah his son king in his stead. Now the rest of the acts of Amon which he did, are they not written in the book of the Chronicles of the kings of Judah? And he was buried [they buried him] in his sepulchre in the garden of Uzza: and Josiah his son reigned in his stead.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

- ¹ Ver. 4. [אשר accus. after a verb of speaking, denoting that in respect to which. Cf. ver. 7 and Gen. xxii. 14 (Ew. § 292, a. 2).]
- ² Ver. 6. [That is, he trained men by special education for this work and then gave them official position.]
- ³ Ver. 6. [The flow of the narrative is arrested in this verse in order to enumerate Manasseh's faults. Hence the use of the perf. consec. Ew. § 242, § 1.]
- ⁴ Ver. 8. [אם, & only, cf. Deut. xv. 5; 1 Kings viii. 25.]
- ⁵ Ver. 8. [אני, וכל אשר צונו. — "That which I commanded" and "the law which Moses commanded" are not two different things. אֲנִי serves to gather up and recapitulate, so that it is equivalent to "namely" or "I mean," cf. Gen. ix. 10; xxiii. 10; 1 Chron. xiii. 1; xxviii. 1: 2 Chron. vii. 21 (א is wanting in 1 Kings ix. 8; Ezra i. 5; Jerem. xix. 18 (Ew. 810, a).]
- ⁶ Ver. 12. [The chetib presents an irregularity of gender, the masc. suff. referring to רעהו. The keri corrects this.]
- ⁷ Ver. 18. ["The perf. מָחָה is very noticeable, especially in view of the accents. We should expect מְחָה and that it would be connected with what follows" (Ew. a. 883, n. 2).—W. G. 8.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 1. Manasseh was twelve years old. It is uncertain whether he was the eldest son of Hezekiah, and whether he had brothers; perhaps his elder brothers had died. "Perhaps a Gebirah (queen-mother) (1 Kings xv. 13) assumed authority until he attained to years of discretion" (The-nius). At any rate there is no hint of a regency. The name מְנַשֶּׁה, My-delight-is-in-her, is applied symbolically to Mount Zion in Isai. lxii. 4.—From ver. 2 we see that the idol-worship which Manasseh introduced was, in the first place, that of Canaan (1 Kings xiv. 24; 2 Kings xvii. 8; xvi. 3).—Luther translates מְנַשֶּׁה, in ver. 3, after the Vulg. (conversusque est et edificavit), and the Sept. (καὶ ἐπιστρέψε καὶ οἰκοδόμησε): "und verkehrte sich und baute" [went astray and built]. The two words, however, form one notion by an idiomatic use: he built again the high places which Hezekiah had removed. For the rest, see 1 Kings xvi. 32 sq. Ahab was the one who first introduced the worship of Baal and Astarte into Israel [see bracketed notes under Exeg. on xvi. 3 and xvii. 16.]

מְנַשֶּׁה here refers no doubt to the Astarte-statue mentioned in ver. 7. In Chronicles we find the plural מְנַשֶּׁהוֹת and מְנַשֶּׁהוֹת. The cause of this may be that each divinity, the male and the female, incorporated several attributes, each of which was separately worshipped. Manasseh introduced also, besides these two chief divinities, the Assyrio-Chaldean star-worship, the adoration of All the host of heaven (see chap. xxiii. 5, 11). [See Exeg. on xvii. 16. Also chap. xxiii. 12 shows that the astral worship, although extended and cultivated by Manasseh, was first introduced by Ahaz.] "This does not imply that the divinities of the Canaanites had no relation to the heavenly bodies, but this relation was subordinate in them" (Movers). From the star-worship arose sooth-saying and magic. Men saw in the stars the originators of all growth and all decay, and adored in them the controllers and directors of all sublunary affairs.—Vers. 4-7 contain a climax. The idolatrous (vers. 2 and 3) Manasseh built idol-altars even in the house of the Lord (ver. 4), and altars also for all the host of heaven, as well in the inner as in the outer court (ver. 5, מְנַשֶּׁה resumes מְנַשֶּׁה in ver. 4), nay, he even went so far that he set up the image of Astarte (ver. 7) inside of the temple, perhaps in the holy place. On the formula: "I will put my name" (ver. 7) see Exeg. on 1 Kings xiv. 21. On מְנַשֶּׁה see notes on chap. xvi. 3.

Sooth-saying and magic are here united with this idolatrous ceremony as they are in chap. xvii. 17 (cf. Levit. xix. 26). So also in Deut. xviii. 10, 11, where the necromancers and augurs are also mentioned. Manasseh gave to these persons official position (מְנַשֶּׁה is used as in 1 Kings xii. 31). On מְנַשֶּׁה see 1 Kings xiv. 1-20, Hist. § 3. On ver. 7 see 1 Kings viii. 16; ix. 3. The house of Jehovah could not be so utterly desecrated in any other way as by setting up an idol in the very sanctuary, the "dwelling," הַבַּיִת (Ps. v. 8; lxxix. 1).

The selection of Israel to be God's peculiar people was thereby rejected.—The words in ver. 8 are explained by 2 Sam. vii. 10, and are added in order to make more apparent the greatness of the sin. Jehovah had, at first, only a dwelling in a tent in the midst of His people; afterwards He caused a house to be built for His dwelling, as a physical sign of His covenant with Israel (see the Introd. § 3, and 1 Kings 6, Hist. § 3, b.); and now in this house Manasseh set up an idol.—More evil than did the nations, &c. (ver. ix.). Not because the Canaanitish nations did not keep the law of Moses, but because they only worshipped their own national deities, while the Israelites adopted, not only the gods of the Canaanites, but also those of the Assyrians and Babylonians, and forsook their own God.

Ver. 10. And the Lord spake by His servants, &c. It is impossible to tell which prophets are meant, for no one of those whose writings we possess can be assigned with certainty to the reign of Manasseh. It is not certain that even Isaiah lived during any part of Manasseh's reign; still less is it certain that Habakkuk did so (though Keil supposes that Habak. i. 5 refers to this reign), for it is probable that he first appeared under Josiah (Winer, Delitsch), or under Jehoiaquim (Knobel). The Amorites (ver. 11) stand for Canaanites in general; see notes on 1 Kings xxi. 26; cf. Ezek. xvi. 3; Amos ii. 9. The expression: both his ears shall tingle, ver. 12, also occurs in 1 Sam. iii. 11 and Jerem. xix. 8. As a sharp, discordant note pains one's ears, so the news of this harsh punishment shall give pain to all who hear of it.—Ver. 13. And I will stretch over Jerusalem the line of Samaria. According to Grotius this means: eodem mensura eam metiar, qua Samaritan mensuravi. So also Thénius: "Measuring line and plummet are here only symbols for testing by a standard," for, he says, a building is built with measuring line and plummet, but not torn down with them. However in Isai. xxxiv. 11 we read: He shall stretch out upon it the line of confusion (devastation) and the stones of emptiness ["plummet of desolation," Bähr], cf. also Lament. ii. 8. Now in the text before us, also, the reference is to devastation. The two implements of construction are employed where there is an empty space of ground, whether it be that no building has ever stood upon it, or that one which stood there has been torn down. We have to understand here a state of things symbolized by the latter of these cases. The metaphor therefore means: I will make Jerusalem even with the ground, like Samaria, so that a measuring line can be drawn over it, and its houses (families) shall perish like the family of Ahab. [Why is a measuring line or a plummet applied to a bare space of ground? Only as a preliminary to building, or re-building, upon it. There is no great applicability, therefore, in the metaphor as Bähr interprets it.—It means that God will come and apply severe standards of judgment to Jerusalem as He had to Samaria; that He will insist that it shall satisfy these standards; and that He will punish inexorably all shortcomings. Samaria had been thus tested, found wanting, and swept from the face of the earth,—so also should it be with Jerusalem.—W. G. S.]

The following figure of the disk is parallel and similar, but stronger if anything. חֲרָבָה means really something hollowed out, hence, a dish (2 Chron. xxxv. 13; Prov. xix. 24), not a wax-tablet (Calmet). Thénius thinks that "the lower city, by its configuration, might well suggest the figure of a dish." However the fact may be in regard to that, we have not to understand that it was what suggested this figure. Neither is the metaphor that of "a hungry man who empties a dish and turns it wrong side up" (Kwald), but that of a person who, when he no longer wants to use a dish, wipes it out, and turns it over, that not a drop may remain in it. Kimchi expressly states that this was the usage of the Jews with dishes. The figure therefore "implies the complete overthrow and destruction of Jerusalem with all its inhabitants" (Keil). The comparison with a dish also involves some contempt. פְּנֵיהֶם is the "upper side, as it were the face, in distinction from the back" (Thénius).—Ver. 14. The remnant of my possession is the two tribes which composed the kingdom of Judah, ten having been led into captivity. אֲבָקָה, i. e., to abandon, but with the accessory notion of throwing away (1 Kings viii. 57; Judges vi. 13; Ezek. xxix. 5). The nation, when abandoned by Jehovah, necessarily becomes a spoil for its enemies (Isai. xlii. 22).

Ver. 16. Moreover Manasseh shed innocent blood. This verse is not a "continuation of the extract from the annals which was broken off at ver. 9" (Thénius). It is closely connected with what is read in vers. 10–15, and forms in a certain sense the crisis of what is narrated of Manasseh. This king not only introduced all sorts of idolatrous worship (vers. 1–9), but also, when Jehovah rebuked and warned him by His prophets (10–15), he not only did not profit by it, but filled the city with their blood and that of all the innocent persons who sided with them, and opposed his godlessness. חַיִּים נְקִיִּים as in chap. x. 21 "from one edge to the other." Josephus (Antiq. x. 3, 1) affirms: πάντας ἐμὴς τοῖς δυνάτοισι τοῖς ἐν τοῖς Ἑβραίοις ἀπέκτεινεν, ἀλλ' οὐδὲ τῶν προφητῶν ἔσχε φεύειν καὶ τοῖσιν δὲ τινὰς καὶ ἡμῶν ἀνέσχεαεν. The latter statement does not, of course, apply to the whole duration of his reign; but there may have been a time during which innocent blood was daily shed. According to the Jewish tradition (Gemara Jebam. iv. 13; cf. Sanhedr. f. 103), which was taken up by the church fathers (Tertul. De Patientia 14. August. De Civit. Dei xviii. 24), Isaiah was put to death under Manasseh. It is said that he was sawed in two while fastened in a cedar tree in which he had taken refuge, cf. Hebr. xi. 37. [For the details of the legend see Stanley, II. p. 544.] But it is doubtful whether he lived under Manasseh. Isai. i. 1 does not say that he lived so long. He must, at any rate, have been very old. It is possible that he may have suffered a martyr's death, though not in the form asserted (cf. Winer, R.-W.-B. i. a. 554. Umbreit in Herzog's Encyc. IV. a. 598 sq.).

Ver. 17. Now the rest of the acts of Manasseh, &c. Some further and very important facts in regard to Manasseh are recorded in 2 Chron. xxxiii. 11–20. The historical truth and credibility of what is there recorded has indeed been denied (Gramberg, Winer, Hitzig, and others). On the other hand, Ewald, Thenius, Hävernick, Keil, and Bertheau, have, with justice, maintained the historical truth of those statements. The Chronicler appeals to the "annals of the kings of Israel," and to the דְּבָרֵי יְהוֹשֻׁעַ as his authorities, and the entire Jewish tradition is built upon the facts which he records. "It is not astonishing that we do not find any reference to those facts in the book of Kings, when we consider the brevity of the narrative there given, a brevity which is to be explained by the fact that the author passes as curtly as possible by all periods of misfortune" (Bertheau). The apparent contradiction between 2 Chron. xxxiii. 15 and 2 Kings xxiii. 12 disappears, if we suppose (what is very possible) that Amon set up again the idols which Manasseh had removed, and that Josiah was the first who entirely did away with them (cf. E. Gerlach in the Studien und Kritiken, 1861, III.).—Ver. 18. In the garden of his own house. "בֵּיתוֹ" cannot be the royal palace built by Solomon, because the garden belonging to it is called that of Uzzah, evidently referring to its former owner. בֵּיתוֹ must, therefore, refer to a pleasure-house belonging to Manasseh" (Keil). Thenius thinks that the "garden of Uzzah" (the name occurs several times: 2 Sam. vi. 8; 1 Chron. viii. 7; Ezra ii. 49; Nehem. vii. 51) was situated "in the Tyropoeon, at the foot of the spur of Ophel." Robinson finds it on Mt. Zion. See further the notes on chap. xx. 21.

Ver. 19. Amon was twenty and two years old when he began to reign. The assertion that this king reigned twelve instead of two years (Ebrard in Stud. und Kritik, 1847, III. s. 644 sq.) rests upon very weak evidence, as Thenius has shown.—The city of Jotbah, from which his mother, Meshullemeth (that is, Friend, ea. of God, = Pia) came, was situated, according to Jerome, in Judah.—Ver. 23. The servants of Amon were unquestionably his court attendants. We have to understand, therefore, that it was a conspiracy in the palace. We cannot determine what causes led to this conspiracy.—By the people of the land (ver. 24) Thenius understands, here as in chap. xi. 14, the military forces of the nation, and he infers that Amon had made himself popular with the troops, and that Josiah had inspired some such hopes as Uzziah once did (chap. xiv. 21). There is no more reason to think of the army here than in chap. xi. 14. The murder of the king, who had only ruled for such a short time, by the attendants in the palace, may have embittered the people of Jerusalem so that they took revenge upon the murderers. Religious differences can scarcely have had anything to do with the matter, for the immediate attendants of the idolatrous king certainly did not belong to the persecuted Jehovah-party, and, if the king's idolatry had been displeasing to the people, they would not have put his murderers to death.

[SUPPLEMENTARY NOTE on contemporaneous history, with further information as to Manasseh from Assyrian sources. As we approach the catastrophe of the history of Judah it is necessary to pay attention to those movements among neighboring nations which (humanly speaking) caused it, and determined its form.

We saw in the Supp. Note on chap. xx. that Sennacherib, having finally reduced Babylon to submission in 682, put his son Esarhaddon on the throne of that city as viceroy; also that Sennacherib was assassinated by two other of his sons in 681. The assassins were obliged to fly; Esarhaddon hastened to Nineveh and ascended the throne. He reigned from 681 to 667. Extensive records of his reign exist in the British Museum, only part of which have, as yet, been published or read (Lenormant). His first campaign was in Syria and Phœnicia (see Supp. Note on chap. xvii.). He conquered and plundered Phœnicia, and deported the inhabitants of Syria. He repopulated the country with Chaldeans and Elamites.

During this campaign he attacked Judah; took Manasseh captive, confined him in Babylon for a time, but then set him at liberty and restored him to the throne as a vassal (2 Chron. xxxiii. 11). Manasseh is mentioned on one of his inscriptions as tributary. Esarhaddon became attached to Babylon from his early residence there, and made it his home. That is probably the reason why he took Manasseh there, and not to Nineveh.

Esarhaddon's reign was spent in extensive and successful wars in Asia Minor, Arabia, Egypt (which he conquered), in suppressing stubborn revolts in Chaldaea, and in punishing the Elamites and Susianians who assisted in them. We are not here interested in these wars further than this, that the Assyrian power was, during his reign, at its height, but that Babylon kept up a continual resistance.

Very much the same state of things continued under his successor. Esarhaddon abdicated in 668 in favor of his son, Ashurbanipal, who reigned until 647. He was warlike and able. Babylon was ruled by his brother, Shamulshamgin, as viceroy, but he revolted and headed an insurrection which included nearly all the tributary provinces. Egypt was permanently lost, Psammetichus becoming king. The remainder of the revolt, however, was speedily suppressed, though it took years to follow up and punish all the parties to it.

His successor was his son, Assurediliani, who reigned from 647 to 625. Under him the Assyrian power declined (Lenormant). See Supp. Note on p. 285.

The explanation of the incessant revolts of Babylon is, that that city had a sacred character as the "home of the gods." It was so regarded by the Assyrians themselves, who knew how ancient it was, and revered it as their own place of origin. This veneration for Babylon served to keep the Babylonians continually restive under the supremacy of Assyria, and also to stay the hands of the conquerors whenever they were ready to destroy the city as a punishment for rebellion.

At the point which we have now reached (640), the time of Amon's death and Josiah's accession, the Assyrian power had barely begun to decline. The Median empire had been founded by Phraortes in 657. It had secured independence, and had made important conquests in Central Asia. Just about this time Phraortes thought himself strong enough to attack Assyria, but he was totally defeated in 635 (Lenormant). In Egypt, Psammetichus became independent of Assyria, and put an end to the "Dodekarchy," about 650. Babylon was, for the time being, crushed, but it was only recovering strength for another revolt.—W. G. S.]

HISTORICAL AND ETHICAL.

1. King Manasseh's reign lasted longer than that of any other king in either kingdom, but we have relatively the very briefest account of it. The author restricts himself to a statement of Manasseh's disposition towards Jehovah and the Jehovah-worship. The explanation of this may be that, in general, "the Old Testament historians pass more hastily over periods which it is sad for them to recall" (Ewald). This shows, however, at the same time, that the disposition towards Jehovah is the main point of interest to the author in the history of each reign, and that everything else is subordinate to this, inasmuch as nothing else touches the soteriological development in the history. Manasseh's reign forms an epoch in that development, for, under him, the apostasy reached its height. If David was the model king, then Manasseh was his inverted image. It is true that many of his ancestors had tolerated idolatry, and practised it themselves. His grandfather, Ahaz, had even removed the ancient altar of burnt-offering and set up in its place another one which he had himself caused to be made on a heathen pattern, and had also sacrificed his son to Moloch (chap. xvi.); but Manasseh went so far as even to establish a special place of sacrifice for this god in the valley of Hinnom (chap. xxiii. 10; Jerem. vii. 31; xix. 6). Moreover he set up an idol in the temple itself, and that, too, an image of that goddess whose worship was connected with licentious rites and practices. In fact he made Jerusalem, the city which Jehovah had chosen for His own abode, the place for collecting and practising all forms of idolatry. He was a violent enemy of the Jehovah-worship, which he sought to abolish. He formally introduced all sorts of idolatrous abominations, and he compelled his people to practise them. This had never been done even in the kingdom of the ten tribes, "but now, there arose in Judah, the only remaining support of the true religion, the most open and violent hostility to its most sacred principles, on the part of the king himself! . . . The heart of the ancient religion had never before been so sharply and violently smitten" (Ewald). The "sin of Manasseh," in which apostasy reached its culmination, became typical (ver. 16; chap. xxiii. 26; xxiv. 3; 2 Chron. xxxiii. 9; Jerem. xv. 4), just like the "sin of Jeroboam," who made Israel to sin by introducing the worship of the calves (1 Kings xii. 28 sq.; xiv. 16; xv. 26, 30, &c.), and the "way of Ahab," who first introduced the worship of Baal (1 Kings xvi. 30 sq.; xxi. 53; 2 Kings viii. 27). "With his reign, therefore, began a new epoch in the history of the kingdom of Judah, during which it moved on steadily towards its fall" (Von Gerlach). Under his rule the kingdom became the very contrary of that which, according to its original plan, it was intended to be (Deut. xvii. 20).

2. A great change seems to have taken place under Manasseh in the circumstances of the people, when we compare the status under him with that under Hezekiah. No king since David had labored, as Hezekiah did during his reign of twenty-nine years, for the pure and legitimate Jehovah-worship. The people had approved of and participated in his efforts, and had come together from all sides to the passover festival which he instituted (2 Chron. xxx. 12, 13). The reformation seemed to be thorough and complete; idolatry was forever uprooted. Immediately after his death there was a complete change. The new king made idolatry, with all its abominations, the established religion of the kingdom, and was violent against the national worship and law, and against all who supported them. The people made no opposition to this, but joined in it for a half century. It had indeed come to pass before this time, that the people had fallen into idolatry which was favored by the rulers, as, for instance, under Athaliah and Ahaz, but such a general and complete change, especially after the saving power of Jehovah had just been so clearly and startlingly manifested, has no parallel in history. Yet this remarkable fact is explained, although no explanation of it is offered in the historical books, when we take into consideration the descriptions of the state of things at that time which are offered by the prophets. There had been for a long time, at least since the reign of Ahaz, a party in Judah which sought support for the little kingdom from one of the two great world-monarchies of the time—either from Egypt or Assyria. The persons of rank, and office, and wealth, and influence especially belonged to this party. They had adopted heathen notions, and had fallen into immoral and licentious modes of life. Isaiah says of the people, even before Manasseh's accession: "The whole head is sick and the whole heart faint," &c. (Isai. i. 4-6). King Hezekiah had held this party in restraint, and had therefore been supported by the prophet Isaiah. After the death of the pious king and the great prophet, the opposition made a strenuous effort to control the policy of the nation. It was not difficult to ensnare and seduce the king, a boy of twelve years, especially as he appears to have been inclined by nature to sensual enjoyments. When he was once caught he became the seducer of his people, while he himself sank lower and lower. It appears, therefore, that Hezekiah's reformation was one accomplished by external pressure. It did not spring naturally from a religious need which was deeply felt in the popular heart. It had, therefore, no firm ground, and the cultus continued to be only an external ceremony. On the other hand, the luxurious and sensuous idol-worship was far better adapted to please the people than the austere Jehovah-worship. We have still further to take into consideration the inconsistent character of the people (Deut. ix. 12, 13; xxxi. 20; xxxii. 6; Isai. i. 2, 3, &c.), at one moment obstinate, at the next fickle and capricious. If we take all this into consideration, the sudden change under Manasseh is not so astonishing, but is satisfactorily explained by the circumstances. Duncker's conception of the course of the development of the national religion (Gesch. des Alterthums, I. s. 502) is entirely false. He asserts that for the first two centuries after the settlement of the Hebrews in Palestine the worship of Jehovah and that of Syrian divinities existed side by side; that the first Hebrew prophets opposed with the most violent zeal and fanaticism the introduction of the Baal-worship; that then the later prophets opposed the deepened and sharpened conception of the national

God to the renewed attempt of idolatry to find a foothold and succeeded in keeping it out; and that now, under Manasseh, these two hostile tendencies once more appeared in open conflict. This conception, which overturns the entire soteriological development, rests upon the assumption that, in Israel, monotheism and polytheism stood originally side by side in equal honor. It cannot be established unless we strike Moses out of history, throw aside the Israelitish law—the constitution of the nation, deny the calling of the nation in human history, and make of the prophets fanatical disturbers of the public peace. Ewald has explained the changed circumstances under Manasseh somewhat differently (Gesch. III. 666 [third Ed. 716 sq.]). He says: "He [Manasseh] sought to become acquainted with all foreign heathen religions, and to introduce them into Judah. He therefore sent to the most distant lands wherever a celebrated worship was practised, and spared no pains to acquire it. Every new religion brought not only a new form of oracle, or of sensuous indulgence and lust, but also its own form of wisdom, and the desire for 'wisdom' had grown so much since the time of Solomon, that it is not strange if the desire awoke to learn the secrets of all religions, and so to acquire a wealth of wisdom which the simple Jehovah religion did not seem to offer. Then, too, Manasseh sought to make all these religions 'accessible and agreeable to the people.'" It would appear then, on this showing, that the abominable and unheard-of apostasy of Manasseh and his people, the cultus of licentiousness and child-sacrifice, the cultivation of augury and sooth-saying, the patronage of necromancers and augurs, and all the rest of his senseless superstition, arose from a desire for wisdom, and a wish to penetrate into all secrets, and become acquainted with all knowledge. No proof is needed to show that this conception contradicts the Scriptures flatly. There is no hint in them that Manasseh sent into foreign lands to import heathen religions. "Isai. lvii. 5-10; Jer. ii. 10-13," from which this is said to be evident, does not contain a word about it. Manasseh did not, for instance, borrow anything from Egypt. He introduced especially the cultus of the "nations whom the Lord destroyed before the children of Israel" (ver. 9), that is of the Canaanites. Neither is there any proof that he tried to make the heathen religions acceptable to the people; on the contrary, he used violence and shed innocent blood, so that Jerusalem was filled with it from one end to the other (ver. 16).

[The Scriptures contain no explanation of the facility with which the people followed and acquiesced in the different attitudes of different kings toward the Jehovah religion, whether they were enthusiastically faithful or fanatically hostile. It does not seem worth while, therefore, to wage a polemic against an hypothesis like this of Ewald, which certainly has as much, if not more, in its favor than the one offered by the author. Ewald's theory does not "flatly contradict" Scripture, because Scripture makes no statement in regard to the matter. The passages quoted from Isaiah and Jeremiah bear very strong testimony to such a disposition on the part of the people to follow strange gods, to go to a distance to seek strange forms of worship, and to take up with any foreign novelty or device rather than to adhere to their own religion. The "wisdom" of the ancients was almost always bound up in religion. It was the "mystery" at the heart of a cultus. It was esoteric and select, only imparted to the chosen few. It had the fascination, therefore, of an acquisition in knowledge and of the discovery of a secret closely kept by an elect few. It was at once a sign of the truth of the Jehovah-religion and a reason why the Hebrews were so easily led to despise it in comparison with the religions of the heathen, that it was simple and open. No doubt also it seemed to them hard and cold and austere. The heathen religions were warm, voluptuous, and æsthetic. The latter, therefore, had all the weaknesses of human nature on their side of the balance. Still further, it is very probable that Manasseh did introduce Egyptian novelties. The name of his son Amon is the strongest testimony to a familiarity with and taste for Egyptian religion. Ver. 9 does not say that he introduced Canaanitish gods, but that he made the Jews sin worse than the Canaanites, probably by practising still more foreign and abominable rites. See Exegetical notes on that verse. Moreover the idols which are enumerated in xxiii. 13 as having been destroyed by Josiah bear witness to the fact that Manasseh had sought out and introduced numerous foreign divinities of various kinds. Finally, the shedding of innocent blood does not prove that he did not try to make heathenism acceptable to his people. Persecution always has the aim to recommend the rival of the persecuted religion, strange and unwise as the attempt may be. There are, therefore, suggestions in this theory of Ewald which are well worth attention from any one who desires to understand the phenomenon in question, and the counter-considerations above adduced have little if any force.—W. G. S.]

3. The reign of Manasseh was, to say the least, the saddest period in Jewish history since the time of David. We hear of no important events, of no victory over enemies, of no extension of the frontier, of no new beneficent institutions, during his time. The only event recorded is that an Assyrian army took Manasseh prisoner and carried him away in chains to Babylon (2 Chron. xxxiii. 11). The nation had never before sunk so low, religiously and morally, as at this time. "In the national life the most terrible decay extended continually farther and farther." A "deep and deadly corruption" had affected the nation (Eisenlohr, Das Volk Isr. II. s. 310). The wildest superstition and the coarsest unbelief went hand in hand. The corruption had pervaded all ranks. "Woe to her that is filthy and polluted, to the oppressing city!" cries the prophet Zephaniah. "She obeyed not the voice; she received not correction; she trusted not in the Lord; she drew not near to her God. Her princes within her are roaring lions; her judges are evening wolves; they gnaw not the bones until the morrow [they spare not for the morrow]. Her prophets are light and treacherous persons; her priests have polluted the sanctuary, they have done violence to the law" (Zeph. iii. 1-4; cf. Mic. iii. 11). The origin of many important parts of the Old Testament canon has recently been ascribed to this time of corruption, decay, moral disease, and death. First of all, the book of Deuteronomy is said to have been written at this time (Ewald, Riehm, Bleek), also the book of Job, an entire series of the most noble Psalms, part of the Proverbs, and detached fragments of the book of Isaiah, especially lii. 13 to liii. 12 (Ewald and Eisenlohr). It is said: "The deeper the corruption became and the farther it spread the more decidedly did the genuine spirit of prophecy rise up, with all the divine force with which it was endowed, in opposition to it." This is not the place to enter into a critical investigation of the time when these books were written. We have to do here only with the time of Manasseh, but in regard to it the test applies: "Do men gather grapes of thorns or figs of thistles?" It is true that faithful servants and prophets of Jehovah were not wanting at this time (ver. 10), but not a single great prophet, not one of those whose writings we still possess, was active during Manasseh's reign. Isaiah's life closed soon after his accession, if not indeed still earlier. Zephaniah's first appearance was in Josiah's reign, and Jeremiah's still later. How could a time of "deep corruption," which ran through all ranks of society, be a time of great literary activity and produce works of the intellect which are only possible in the midst of the richest and most active intellectual life? It has been justly said that this was a time in which "bloody persecution raged." Blood flowed in streams. Of course this persecution fell first of all upon the prophets, and especially upon the most prominent amongst them. The number of the faithful must, therefore, have been small, and we know of not a single prominent person amongst them. It may be that in this small circle hymns of affliction and persecution arose, but it is inconceivable that such persons should have produced the book of Job, that "model of religious reflection, and of the literary art which proceeds in its creations according to the most definite plan," and which marks the "Chokmah-literature" of the Hebrews (Delitsch). Still less can the book of Deuteronomy have been written at this time of oppression and misery, a book which is described as marked by "a tranquil fulness of detail," "an extraordinarily light and flowing style," as well as by "breadth and fluency" (Vaihinger). In its long repetition and development of the Mosaic Law there is not a sign of lamentation, nor a sound of affliction. It might be asserted with far more justice that there was no period in Hebrew history less capable of producing the book of Deuteronomy than the degenerate times of Manasseh.

4. The brief reign of king Amon was in every respect a continuation of the wicked and untheocratic reign of his father, Manasseh. It was distinguished by no fact or event. From the words, 2 Chron. xxxiii. 23 [see Supp. Note after the Exeg. section above]: "And humbled not himself before the Lord, as Manasseh his father had humbled himself, but Amon trespassed more and more," we infer that he was even worse than Manasseh. The description of the moral and religious status which is given by the prophet Zephaniah, who made his appearance under the next following king, Josiah (Zeph. i. 1, 4 sq.; 12; iii. 1 to v. 11), shows that no improvement had taken place. This also appears from the description in chap. xxiii. 4 sq. of all the steps which Josiah had to take in order to restore the state of things prescribed by the Law. The statement of the Chronicler (l. c.) in regard to Manasseh's reformation must, therefore, be understood as referring to his own person, for it had no effect upon the mass of the people, else it would have been impossible to say that Amon had surpassed his father's guilt. [The meaning of that passage is that Manasseh, in spite of all his wickedness, humbled himself and repented, but Amon never did so. He persisted in his wickedness. He went on from trespass to trespass without interruption. Hence he was worse than his father.]

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Vers. 1-16. The Kingdom of Judah under Manasseh. (a) King and People (return to heathenism and the cause thereof, vers. 1-9). (b) The Prophets (their courageous opposition and their testimony against the general corruption in spite of persecution, vers. 10-16). Vers. 1-9. Manasseh the seduced and the seducer.—Even God-fearing parents often have perverse children without any fault of their own. So much the greater is the guilt of those who lead infant children astray, after the death of their parents, instead of giving them care and good training. It is especially important that princes should be guided in their youth by good counsellors and governors. God is not confined with His word to any land or people. If His word is not received with love and gratitude, and if it is not feared, then He will come soon and remove the candlestick from its place (Rev. ii. 5), so that men may go astray and become a prey to terrible errors. As Judah, which the Lord had chosen to be His people and to bear His name before the heathen, and before kings, and before the children of Israel, committed more terrible abominations than any of the heathen whom the Lord had cast out, so now also, a people, although it has the word of God and the means of grace, may fall lower than another which has never heard of His word (e. g., the horrors of the French revolution).—To fall is easier than to rise. If the infection comes from above it spreads with greater celerity. Where God punishes a people he gives them bad rulers (Isai. iii. 4; Eccl. x. 16).—When the evil spirit is cast out and then returns, he brings with him seven others worse than himself. It is so with individuals, and it is so with families; they become worse and worse from generation to generation (Ahaz, Hezekiah, Manasseh), Matt. xii. 43 sq.—WÜRT. SUMM.: There are nowadays Evangelical Christians who are in many respects worse than Papists, or even than Jews and Turks, for they curse and blaspheme, they drink and commit adultery, and do other things which Turks and Jews avoid. How will such Christians stand before God's judgment-seat when Jews and Turks are placed by their side?—CRAMER: Those who are ungrateful towards God, and blind to the clear light of truth, are given over to the dominion of error, so that they give their faith to falsehoods (2 Thess. ii. 11).—Ver. 6. The Scriptures place sooth-saying and augury by the side of sacrifices to Moloch. They belong properly to the darkest times of heathenism. Nevertheless they are found in the midst of modern Christendom. Those who believe in them and practise them have become heathen.—Ver. 7. CALW. BINEL: Ahaz had once closed the temple and built altars in the city. Manasseh set up idols in the temple itself. Thus Antichrist shall advance (2 Thess. ii. 3, 4).—Manasseh set up an image of the goddess of licentiousness in the temple of the living God. "If any man defile the temple of God, him shall God destroy" (1 Cor. iii. 17). These houses of God are desecrated in which, instead of the living God who revealed Himself to us in Christ, a God of man's invention is preached.—Ver. 8. STARKE: Men are such that they hold fast the covenant of God's rich promises, but will not remember the other covenant of the obedience which He requires.—Ver. 10. Even in the worst times God takes care (since He does not desire that any one should perish, but rather that he should turn from his wickedness and live, Ezek. xviii. 23) that faithful persons shall not be wanting to warn the wicked, to exhort them to repentance, and to make known to them the coming judgment of God.—Vers. 12 and 13. WÜRT. SUMM.: The just God threatens the idolatrous city, Jerusalem, with the line and plummet of Samaria;—like sins deserve like punishment (Luke xxiii. 41).—The Lord is "good" and "ready to forgive" (Ps. lxxxvi. 5), but He does not cease to be a just God, who causes every individual as well as whole cities and peoples to reap that which they have sown, for "righteousness and judgment are the habitation [foundation] of his throne" (Ps. xcvi. 2). This generation wants to hear only of a God who is nothing but love, but it will not hear, in spite of its apostasy, of a God who is also a consuming fire (Heb. xii. 29). Whose ears tingle nowadays when he hears of the judgments of God? (Heb. x. 26 and 27).—BERLIN. BIBEL: A dish is turned over when there is nothing more in it. That is the hardest punishment which God can inflict on a soul which turns away from Him. There is then no longer a drop to be found in it of that which was in it before.—Ver. 16. STARKE: Idolatry and tyranny are closely allied.—OSANDER: Those whom Satan has in his toils he leads from one sin to another. Enmity to the word of God is not merely a different opinion or contradiction in regard to religious matters, but a devilish power which impels even to the shedding of innocent blood. It is possible to kill the preachers of truth, but not the truth itself. He who was the truth was nailed to the cross, but His words remain, though heaven and earth pass away. The blood of the martyrs only fertilized the soil of the Church, so that it has borne richer and more abundant fruit.—All innocent blood cries to heaven as that of Abel did. He who dwells in heaven answers: "Vengeance is mine; I will repay."

Vers. 19-26. How wretchedly a king appears of whom history has nothing more to record than his godlessness.—WÜRT. SUMM.: When men will not heed either good words or bad, and will not be induced to repent by warning or example, then God comes with His punishment and recompenses wickedness as it deserves. Let men take heed and repent, let them become wise by the sight of others' calamities, that they be not overtaken in their sins by death before they have repented. As is the king so are his officers; as is the governor so are the citizens; a depraved king ruins his country (Sir. x. 2, 3).—WÜRT. SUMM.: Unfaithfulness is punished by unfaithfulness. Amon was not faithful to God; unfaithfulness was his punishment. He was murdered by his own servants, and these in their turn were punished by their own sin—they also were murdered. (See Matt. xxvi. 52; Luke vi. 28.) Therefore be faithful both to God and man and do good, then thou shalt be rewarded with good both in time and eternity. Tumult and murder, perpetrated now by the authorities, now by the people, those are the natural fruits which are produced in a land which has abandoned God, and in which His word is no longer respected.

B.—The Reign of Josiah; the Discovery of the Book of the Law, and Restoration of the Mosaic Ritual.

CHAP. XXII-XXIII. 30 (2 CHRON. XXXIV., XXXV.).

- 1 JOSIAH was eight years old when he began to reign [became king], and he reigned thirty and one years in Jerusalem. And his mother's name was Jedidah, the daughter of Adaiah of Boscath. And he did that which was right in the sight of the Lord, and walked in all the way of David his father, and turned not aside to the right hand or to the left.
- 2 And it came to pass in the eighteenth year of king Josiah, that the king sent Shaphan the son of Azaliah, the son of Meshullam, the scribe, to the house of the
- 3 Lord, saying, Go up to Hilkiah the high priest, that he may sum the silver which is [has been] brought into the house of the Lord, which the keepers of
- 4 the door have gathered of the people: And let them deliver it [and may deliver it] into the hand of the doers of the work [commissioners], that have the oversight of the house of the Lord: and let them give it to the doers of the work, which is [who are] in the house of the Lord, to repair the breaches of the
- 5 house, Unto carpenters, and builders, and masons, and to buy timber and hewn
- 6 stone to repair the house. Howbeit, there was [But let] no reckoning [be] made with them of the money that was [is] delivered into their hand, because [for] they dealt [deal] faithfully.
- 7 And Hilkiah the high priest said unto Shaphan the scribe, I have found the book of the law in the house of the Lord. And Hilkiah gave the book to Sha-

9 phan, and he read it. And Shaphan the scribe came to the king, and brought the king word again, and said, Thy servants have gathered [emptied out] the money that was found [stored] * in the house, and have delivered it into the hand of them that do the work [the commissioners], that have the oversight of 10 the house of the Lord. And Shaphan the scribe shewed the king, saying, Hil-
 11 kiah the priest hath delivered me a book. And Shaphan read it before the king.
 12 And it came to pass, when the king had heard the words of the book of the law, 13 that he rent his clothes. And the king commanded Hilkiah the priest, and 14 Ahikam the son of Shaphan, and Achbor the son of Michaiah, and Shaphan the 15 scribe, and Asahiah a servant of the king's, saying, Go ye, inquire of the Lord 16 for me [on my behalf] and for [on behalf of] the people, and for [on behalf of] 17 all Judah, concerning [on account of] the words of this book that is found: for 18 great is the wrath of the Lord that is kindled against us, because our fathers 19 have not hearkened unto the words of this book, to do according unto all that 20 which is written concerning us [prescribed for us].*

14 So Hilkiah the priest, and Ahikam, and Achbor, and Shaphan, and Asahiah, 15 went unto Huldah the prophetess, the wife of Shallum the son of Tikvah, the son
 16 of Harhas, keeper of the wardrobe; (now she dwelt in Jerusalem in the college 17 [lower city];) and they communed with her. And she said unto them, Thus 18 saith the Lord God of Israel, Tell the man that sent you to me, Thus saith the 19 Lord, Behold, I will [am about to] bring evil upon this place, and upon the 20 inhabitants thereof, even all the words of the book which the king of Judah hath 21 read: Because they have forsaken me, and have burned incense unto other 22 gods, that they might provoke me to anger with all the works of their hands; 23 therefore my wrath shall be [is] kindled against this place, and shall not be 24 quenched. But to the king of Judah which sent you to inquire of the Lord, 25 thus shall ye say to him, Thus saith the Lord God of Israel, As touching the 26 words which thou hast heard; Because thine heart was tender, and thou hast
 27 humbled [humbledst] thyself before the Lord, when thou heardest what I spake 28 [had spoken] against this place, and against the inhabitants thereof, that they 29 should become a desolation and a curse, and hast rent thy clothes, and wept 30 before me; I also have heard thee [omitted thee] saith the Lord. Behold therefore, 31 I will gather thee unto thy fathers, and thou shalt be gathered into thy grave
 32 in peace; and thine eyes shall not see all the evil which I will bring upon this 33 place. And they brought the king word again.

CHAP. xxiii. 1 AND the king sent, and they gathered unto him all the elders of 2 Judah and of Jerusalem. And the king went up into the house of the Lord, and 3 all the men of Judah and all the inhabitants of Jerusalem with him, and the 4 priests, and the prophets, and all the people, both small and great: and he read
 5 in their ears ~~at~~ the words of the book of the covenant which was [had been]
 6 found in the house of the Lord. And the king stood by a pillar [or on a plat-
 7 form], and made a covenant before the Lord, to walk after the Lord, and to keep 8 his commandments and his testimonies [ordinances] and his statutes with all 9 their heart and all their soul, to perform [maintain] the words [terms] of this 10 covenant that were written in this book. And all the people stood to [joined 11 in] * the covenant.

4 And the king commanded Hilkiah the high priest, and the priests of the 5 second order, and the keepers of the door, to bring forth out of the temple of the 6 Lord all the vessels that were made for Baal, and for the grove [Astarte], and 7 for all the host of heaven: and he burned them without Jerusalem in the fields
 8 of Kidron, and carried * the ashes of them unto Beth-el. And he put down
 9 [caused to desist] the idolatrous priests, whom the kings of Judah had ordained
 10 to burn incense * in the high places in [of] the cities of Judah, and in the places 11 [omitted in the places] round about Jerusalem; them also that burned incense unto 12 Baal, to the sun, and to the moon, and to the planets [constellations of the 13 Zodiac], and to all the host of heaven. And he brought out the grove [Astarte-
 14 image] from the house of the Lord, without Jerusalem, unto the brook Kidron, 15 and burned it at the brook Kidron, and stamped it small to powder, and cast

- the powder thereof upon the graves of the children of the people [common people]. And he brake down the houses of the sodomites [male-prostitutes], that were by the house of the Lord, where the women wove hangings for the grove [tent-like shrines for Astarte]. And he brought all the priests out of the cities of Judah, and defiled the high places where the priests had burned incense, from Geba to Beersheba, and brake down the high places of the gates [both] that were [which was] in the entering in of the gate of Joshua the governor of the city, [and that] which were [was] on a man's left hand at the gate of the city. Nevertheless the priests of the high places came not up to [were not allowed to sacrifice upon] the altar of the Lord in Jerusalem, but they did eat of the [omit of the] unleavened bread among their brethren. And he defiled Topheth, which is the valley of the children of Hinnom, that no man might make his son or his daughter to pass through the fire to Molech. And he took away the horses that the kings of Judah had given to the sun, at the entering in of the house of the Lord, by the chamber of Nathan-melech the chamberlain, which was in the suburbs [colonnade of the temple], and burned the chariots of the sun with fire. And the altars that were on the top of the upper chamber of Ahaz, which the kings of Judah had made, and the altars which Manasseh had made in the two courts of the house of the Lord, did the king beat down [demolish], and brake [tear] them [omit them] down from thence, and [he] cast the dust of them into the brook Kidron. And the high places that were before Jerusalem, which were on the right hand of the mount of corruption, which Solomon the king of Israel had builded for Ashtoreth [or Astarte] the abomination of the Zidonians, and for Chemosh the abomination of the Moabites, and for Milcom the abomination of the children of Ammon, did the king defile. And he brake in pieces the images, and cut down the groves [Astarte-statues], and filled their places with the bones of men.
- Moreover the altar that was at Beth-el, and [omit and] the high place which Jeroboam the son of Nebat, who made Israel to sin, had made, both that altar and the high place he brake down, and burned the high place, and stamped it small to powder, and burned the grove [statue of Astarte]. And as Josiah turned himself, he spied the sepulchres that were there in the mount, and sent, and took the bones out of the sepulchres, and burned them upon the altar, and polluted it, according to the word of the Lord which the man of God proclaimed, who proclaimed these words. Then he said, What title [grave-stone] is that that I see? And the men of the city told him, It is the sepulchre of the man of God, which came from Judah, and proclaimed [foretold] these things that thou hast done against the altar of Beth-el. And he said, Let him alone; let no man move his bones. So they let his bones alone, with the bones of the prophet that came out of Samaria. And all the houses also of the high places that were in the cities of Samaria, which the kings of Israel had made to provoke the Lord to anger, Josiah took away, and did to them according to all the acts that he had done in Beth-el. And he slew all the priests of the high places that were there [,] upon the altars, and burned men's bones upon them, and returned to Jerusalem.
- And the king commanded all the people, saying, Keep the passover unto the Lord your God, as it is written in the [this] book of this [the] covenant. Surely there was not holden such a passover from the days of the judges that judged Israel, nor in all the days of the kings of Israel, nor of the kings of Judah; But in the eighteenth year of king Josiah, wherein [omit, and wherein] this passover was holden to the Lord in Jerusalem.
- Moreover the workers with familiar spirits [necromancers], and the wizards, and the [household] images, and the idols, and all the abominations that were spied in the land of Judah and in Jerusalem, did Josiah put away, that he might perform [establish] the words of the law, which were written in the book that Hilkiyah the priest found in the house of the Lord. And like unto him was there no king before him, that turned to the Lord with all his heart, and with all his soul, and with all his might, according to all the law of Moses; neither after him arose there any like him.

- 26 Notwithstanding, the Lord turned not from the fierceness of his great wrath, wherewith his anger was kindled against Judah, because of all the provocations
- 27 that Manasseh had provoked him withal. And the Lord said, I will remove Judah also out of my sight, as I have removed Israel, and will cast off this city Jerusalem which I have chosen, and the house of which I said, My name shall
- 28 be there. Now the rest of the acts of Josiah, and all that he did, are they not written in the book of the Chronicles of the kings of Judah?
- 29 In his days Pharaoh-nechoh king of Egypt went up against the king of Assyria to the river Euphrates: and king Josiah went against him; and he
- 30 slew him at Megiddo, when he had seen him. And his servants carried him in a chariot dead from Megiddo, and brought him to Jerusalem, and buried him in his own sepulchre. And the people of the land took Jehoahaz the son of Josiah, and anointed him, and made him king in his father's stead.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 5.—The shetib, שֵׁטִיב, is altogether to be preferred to the keri, שֵׁטִיב—Bähr. [The E. V. follows the keri. Böttcher's explanation is to be preferred. He retains the shetib and punctuates שֵׁטִיב, explaining the suffix as an irregularity in gender. Cf. Gramm., note on 2 Kings xvi. 17, and Böttcher § 677, a.—W. G. S.]

² Ver. 5.—[Here also the shetib, שֵׁטִיב, is to be preferred to the keri שֵׁטִיב. Cf. Jerem. xi. 6; xli. 18. שֵׁטִיב, in ver. 9, cannot prove the contrary.—Bähr.

³ Ver. 9.—[They had emptied out the money from receptacles into which it had been put by the priests as it was offered from time to time by the people, and in which it was stored, so that it was "found" there, as the text says, literally.

⁴ Ver. 18.—[Literally, "written upon," or "against us."

⁵ Chap. xxiii. 3.—[Literally: stood in. Probably they signified their assent and participation by standing in a certain place. Hence it means "joined in." So Kell, Thienius, Luther, De Wette, Bähr, Bunsen. Maurer and Gesenius take it to mean persist or persevere, which would be the modern colloquial significance of the "stood to" of the E. V., but is not the proper sense here.

⁶ Ver. 4.—[שֵׁטִיב]: the strict rule of the language would here require the imperf. consec. Other instances of laxity in the use of this form occur in late books, Jerem. xxxvii. 15; Ezek. ix. 7; xxxvii. 7, 10; Dan. xii. 6, and in the book of Ecclesiastes. (Böttcher § 962, II.)

⁷ Ver. 5.—[וְיָקַם]; that one might offer: the subject is the indef. sing. French, on, Germ. man. The singular, however, is very remarkable, and the text may be incorrect. The versions all translate as if it were וְיָקַם, "for which וְיָקַם" is probably an error of the pen" (Kell). Böttcher takes the imperf. consec. as a pluperfect, because it follows

another plup., and compares Gen. xxi. 84, and 1 Sam. xix. 18.—"Whom the kings of Judah had appointed and [who, i. e. any one amongst them] had offered incense." This makes good sense, but the change from passive to active, and from plup. to sing., is awkward, and the grammatical principles are not clear.

⁸ Ver. 9.—[Such is the force of the imperf. "They might not," i. e., they were not allowed to.

⁹ Ver. 11.—[Literally: he caused to cease; i. e., these horses of the sun had been kept as an act of worship to the sun. He took them away and put an end to the arrangement.

¹⁰ Ver. 24.—[וְיָקַם, set upright, i. e., that he might introduce the institutions and customs prescribed in the law and establish them in successful operation.—W. G. S.]

PRELIMINARY REMARKS.

The parallel account in the book of Chronicles coincides perfectly with the above in all its details. In some passages, indeed, it is identically the same (chap. xxii. 8-20 and xxiii. 1-3 compared with 2 Chron. xxiv. 19-32); but the Chronicler cannot have made use of the book of Kings as his authority, for he gives a number of chronological data, and also certain proper names (xxiv. 3, 8, 12; xxv. 8, 9), which are wanting in the book of Kings, and which cannot possibly have been invented at a later time. The case is the same with this passage as with chap. xi. 1-20. Both accounts are taken from one and the same original source, viz., the work which both refer to at the close of the passage (chap. xxiii. 28; 2 Chron. xxv. 27). Their principal points of difference are two: viz., that each one describes in great detail certain ones of the facts noticed, which in their turn are passed over more summarily by the other, and that the facts are not narrated by both in the same chronological order.

In the book of Kings the extirpation of idolatry and of illegitimate Jehovah-worship is described with care and detail, so that the passage here which deals with this point (xxiii. 4-20) is, as regards its external form, longer than the corresponding one in Chronicles; moreover, as regards its contents, it is by far the most important passage in the entire narrative, all that goes before it (xxii. 3-20 and xxiii. 1-3) serving only as an historical introduction, and all which follows (xxiii. 21-24) only as the conclusion and sequel to it. In Chronicles, on the other hand, the description of the passover festival is the object of greatest interest, as is evident, in the first place, from the fulness with which it is given (2 Chron. xxiv. 1-19), while the extirpation of the false worship is very briefly recorded. [This is in accord with what we observe in general in regard to the characteristics of the two books. The book of Kings attaches the interest to the religious and theocratic features of the history, while the book of Chronicles is especially interested in its ecclesiastical details. In Kings we have the history studied from the standpoint of the prophets; in Chronicles, from that of the levitical priesthood. In Kings we find those details especially prominent which refer to ethical, religious, and monotheistic truth; in Chro- nicles the fortunes of the priesthood, and the ritualistic and hierarchical developments, are all fastened upon and described in detail.—W. G. S.] Evidently these fundamental characteristics of the two authors present themselves in their accounts of this reign. The older author gives us an account from his theocratic and pragmatic standpoint. He desires to show that king Josiah stands alone in the history of the Jewish kings, in that he carried out in practice and execution the fundamental law of the theocracy with a zeal and severity equalled by none of his predecessors or successors (xxiii. 24 and 25. The statement is wanting in Chronicles.) The latter author, on the contrary, adopts the levitical and priestly standpoint. He desires to show that the passover had not been so solemnly or correctly celebrated since the time of Samuel as it was under Josiah. For this reason we must regard the account in Kings as more important, and use that in Chronicles merely as a valuable complement to it.—As for the chronological succession of the events, the author of the book of Kings puts the eighteenth year of Josiah's reign at the head of the narrative. He says that the repair of the temple, during which the Book of the Law was found, took place in this year; that the reading of this book agitated the king so much that he sought higher guidance in regard to it; that he, after this guidance had been given him through the prophetess Huldah, collected the people and bound them to observe the covenant prescribed in this book; that he then proceeded to extirpate all false worship, and abolish idolatry, first in Jerusalem and Judah, and then in Samaria, and when he had accomplished this, that he ordained an observance of the passover according to the strict prescriptions of the book. It must be admitted that this is a sequence of events in which each one follows naturally and necessarily from the preceding. The Chronicler, on the other hand, begins his account with these words: "In the eighth year of his [Josiah's] reign, while he was a boy [עָרֵץ], he commenced to seek the God of his father David, and in his twelfth year he commenced to purify Judah and Jerusalem from the high-places, and the Astarte-images, and the idols of stone and the molten images, and they tore down before him the altars of the Baalim," &c. After the same had been done in "the land of Israel" he "returned to Jerusalem" (chap. xxxiv. 3-7). After this followed, still in the eighteenth year, the repair of the temple, during which the Book of the Law was found. This occasioned the oracle of the prophetess and the oath of fidelity to the covenant from the assembled people. Immediately after the description of the last event follows the remark: "And Josiah took away all the abominations out of all the countries that pertained to the children of Israel, and made all who were present in Israel to serve, even to serve the Lord their God" (chap. xxxiv. 33). Then, in chap. xxxv., follows the description of the passover. The chronicler, therefore, puts the extirpation of idolatry before the repair of the temple and the discovery of the Book of the Law, and before the oath of fidelity to the covenant. This cannot, however, be the correct chronological sequence of the events, for the incentive which moved Josiah to collect the people and exact an oath of fidelity to the covenant from them was the threats of the newly discovered Law-book. Such an oath would have been useless and destitute of significance if every illegitimate cultus had already been abolished. The chronicler seems to have perceived this himself, for he repeats, in brief and condensed form, after the narrative of the discovery of the book, and after the public oath of fidelity, the statement of the reformation in the cultus which he had already given in vers. 4-7. On the other hand, his definite chronological statements in ver. 3: In the eighth and in the twelfth years of Josiah, statements which are wanting in the book of Kings, cannot be pure inventions of his own, especially if it is true that the sixteenth year of life, that is, in this case, the eighth year of the reign, was "the year in which, according to numerous indications, the king's sons became of age" (Ewald). It is also unlikely that the king, who had been remarkable for his piety from his youth up, should have suddenly undertaken such a startling reformation in the eighteenth year of his reign. The repair of the temple previous to the discovery of the book shows that he was disposed to foster the Jehovah-worship. What he did in his eighth and twelfth years may have been a commencement and preparation for what he carried out in his eighteenth year with thoroughness and severity, being impelled by the threats contained in the book which had been discovered. This eighteenth year was, therefore, the real year of the reformation, the year in which there was a complete change in the religious worship of the nation, and in which Josiah accomplished the work by virtue of which he stands alone in the history of the kingdom. This is the reason why the author of the book of Kings puts this date at the head of his narrative, omitting any mention of the eighth and twelfth years, and also repeats it at the close (chap. xxiii. 23). The chronicler, on the contrary, who only mentions the abolition of the illegal and illegitimate worship in the briefest manner, desired to add to his statement that Josiah "began" in his twelfth year "to purify Judah and Jerusalem" the further information how he carried this out, although somewhat later, in the land of Israel also. This uncertainty in the arrangement of the historical material is due to the imperfection of the art of the historian, and it is not right to ascribe to the account in general, as De Wette does, "distortion of the sense, confusedness, and obscurity." Neither is it by any means correct to assert, as Keil and Movers do, that "the account of the chronicler is, on the whole, more correct, chronologically," for it is not possible that the abolition of idolatry, even in Judah, should have taken place before the discovery of the Law-book, as chap. xxxiv. 6, 7 seems to assert. The assertion that "not all the events mentioned in this account (chap. xxi. 3-xxiii. 23) could have taken place in the one eighteenth year," especially seeing that the passover feast belonged in the commencement and not at the end of the year (Keil), is not founded on conclusive arguments, for the eighteenth year is a year of the reign, not a calendar year, and its end may very well have fallen at the commencement of the calendar year; moreover, we do not see why the work of destruction might not have been accomplished in one year, seeing that it met with no opposition. Thenius even thinks that it was accomplished "in a period of four months." [Nevertheless, as Keil says (Comm. s. 352): "If we take in review the separate events and incidents which are narrated in this passage, the repair of the temple, the discovery of the Law-book, the reading of it to the king, the inquiry of the prophetess and her oracle, the reading of the book to the people in the temple with the renewal of the covenant, the abolition of idolatry not only in Judah, but also in Bethel and the other cities of Samaria, and, finally, the passover festival, it is hardly necessary to remark that all this cannot have taken place in the one eighteenth year of his reign." It is not necessary to suppose, as Bertheau does, that both narratives are chronologically inaccurate, inasmuch as "events are included in the narrative [xxiii. 4-20] which belong to the time before the eighteenth year." It is certain that Josiah "began" to reform before his eighteenth year, but the events mentioned in 2 Chron. xxxiv. 4-7 belong not to this time, but to the eighteenth year, and there is no reason to transfer to the time before this year events which belong to this year itself. [The author's opinion is, therefore, that Josiah's undertaking to repair the temple bears witness to his disposition to reform the cultus, and that this, in connection with the assertion of the chronicler that he made certain efforts to this end in his twelfth year, forces us to the conviction that the reformation commenced before the eighteenth year of the reign, but that those efforts in this direction which he is said by the chronicler to have made before his eighteenth year really belong to that year, including all the reformatory measures of which the Scripture has preserved a record.—W. G. S.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL

Ver. 1. Josiah was eight years old, &c. Amos was twenty-four years old when he died (chap. xxi. 19). He must have begotten Josiah when he was only sixteen years old. This is not astonishing in view of the early marriages which are common in the Orient (see notes on chap. xvi. 2). Whether the young king was under a regency, or had an elderly man as tutor and governor, as Joash did (chap. xii. 3), is not stated. We know nothing of Bosath, the birth-place of his mother, except that it was in the plain of Judah (Josh. xv. 39). Ver. 2 characterizes in general the reign of Josiah, and forms, as it were, the title of the entire following passage. The expression: "Turned not aside to the right hand or to the left" (see Deut. v. 32; xvii. 11, 20; xxviii. 14) is only used of this king in this book.—On the chronological date: "in the eighteenth year," see Preliminary Remarks. The addition in the Sept.: ἐν τῇ μνηρῇ τῷ ὀνόματι, is not found anywhere else, and does not deserve any attention. In Chronicles (xxxiv. 8) two other persons are mentioned whom the king sent with Shaphan, Manasseiah, the governor, and Joah, the recorder. Shaphan alone is mentioned here, as he was the one who had charge of the money. The others were merely companions. On סָפֵר, see notes on 1 Kings iv. 3.

Ver. 4. Go up to Hilkiah, the high-priest, &c. Since the time of Joash (chap. xii. 5), a period of 250 years, the temple had not been repaired. It had, therefore, become very much dilapidated. Josiah went to work according to the precedent established by Joash. "The fact that we find here almost the same account as in chap. xii. 11 sq. is due to the similarity of the two incidents, and is perfectly natural, so that it cannot be regarded as a proof that the account is untrue (Stähelin, Krit. Untersuch. s. 156) (Thenius). The account is here somewhat abbreviated and presupposes some things which are there distinctly stated. The author only mentions the temple-repairs because they brought the Law-book to light. The high-priest Hilkiah is mentioned in the list of the high-priests, and is designated as the son of Shallum (1 Chron. vi. 13). Nothing further is known in regard to him. Many have supposed that he was the father of the prophet Jeremiah (Jer. i. 1), (Kiehlhorn, Von Bohlen, and Menzel), but this is certainly an error, as Hitzig in the prolegomena to his Comm. on Jeremiah has shown. חִלְקִיָּהוּ is hildl from חָלַף, and means, to make perfect (see Fürst s. v.) not, to pay (Gesenu.). [This money was the result of offerings which came in slowly and steadily. The force of חִלְקִיָּהוּ is to take up the money which had been paid in up to this time, make an account and settlement, and so finish up, make complete, the sum on hand. The E. V. "sum" is, therefore, quite accurate.—W. G. S.] Hilkiah's duty in the circumstances was that which is described more fully in chap. xii. 10

sq. The conjecture חִלְקִיָּהוּ, i. e., and seal up (Thenius) is entirely unnecessary. The translation of the Sept., κατείσταρε, is incorrect. So is also that of the Vulg.: confetur pecunia. According to 2 Chron. xxxiv. 9 the money was paid in "by Manasseh and Ephraim, and all the remnant of Israel, as well as by all Judah and Benjamin, and the inhabitants of Jerusalem." The names of the commissioners or inspectors are also given there (ver. 12), but they have no further interest or importance.

Ver. 8. I have found the book of the Law in the house of the Lord. The emphasis lies here, as the position of the words [Hebr. text] shows, on הַסֵּפֶר הַהוּא, words which can only be translated "the book of the Law," according to the familiar rule: "If a compound notion, expressed by a governing noun and a dependent genitive, has to have the article, this is regularly placed before the genitive, but it then affects the entire compound" (Gesenius, Gramm. § 109, 1 [19th Ed. § 111, 1]; Ewald, Lehrb. § 290, a, 1). כֵּתָב is here emphatic, and does not mean, to fall in with something which is known to be somewhere at hand, but to discover something which is concealed (cf. Levit. v. 22 and 23 [English text vi. 3 and 4], where we find with it אֶבְרָהָהוּ, i. e., something lost).

[כֵּתָב] means to find in three different senses: (a) to find a thing of whose existence one has knowledge, and which one therefore seeks for; (b) to find, by accident, a thing whose existence was known, but which had for some time been lost sight of; (c) to find a new thing which one never had seen or heard of before. The author thinks that the second meaning is the one which it has here. Ewald, quoted immediately below, takes it in the third sense.—W. G. S.] We see in the course of the narrative that this book is always referred to as that which had been "found" [יָצָא, rescued from concealment] (chap. xxiii. 13; xxiii.

2, 24; 2 Chron. xxxiv. 14; xxi. 30). It is, therefore, arbitrary and violent of Ewald, who established the above rule, to give to these words, on account of other considerations, the "indefinite sense:" "Hilkiah also (!) spoke with Shaphan about a (!) book of the law which he said he had found in the temple," and to assert in the note: "There is no possible reference here to an old already known, and now only rediscovered, book of the Law." The appeal to סֵפֶר (ver. 10) has no force, for there הַתּוֹרָה is to be supplied from ver. 8, for

Hilkiah had already definitely described it as the book of the Law, and Shaphan brought it to the king as such. [We have no right to interpolate the הַתּוֹרָה in ver. 10. The fact is rather as follows:

In ver. 8 Hilkiah calls it "the book of the Law," because he is convinced that it is so; in ver. 10 Shaphan presents it to the king as a book, in regard to whose character he does not himself express any opinion, nor desire to raise any prejudice. It is simply an interesting book deserving the king's attention and examination. Such is the true meaning of the text as it stands with הַתּוֹרָה in Hilkiah's description, but omitted in Shaphan's. We obliterate this feature of the narrative if we supply הַתּוֹרָה in ver. 10.—W. G. S.] Thenius justly says, in contradiction of Ewald: "The expression shows distinctly that it refers to a book which was known in earlier times, not to one which had now for the first time come to light," and Bunsen says: "It certainly refers to a work which had been previously known." Nothing but the critic's preconceived notion could lead him to contradict this. Now there can be no doubt as to what is meant by the expression סֵפֶר הַתּוֹרָה,

for it is the well-known technical expression for the books of Moses as a whole. In the parallel passage in Chronicles we read (xxxiv. 14): "Hilkiah, the priest, found סֵפֶר תּוֹרַת יְהוָה בֵּית יְהוָה מִלְכָּה," and according to Deut. xxi. 24-26, Moses, after he had finished writing out the whole law (עַד-חֲמִשָּׁה), said to the levites: "Take סֵפֶר יְהוָה, and lay it by the side of the ark of the covenant." In chap. xxiii. 2, 3, 21; 2 Chron. xxxiv. 30, 31, we find instead סֵפֶר הַבְּרִית, but this expression also designates the books of Moses as a whole. It is the same as כְּלֵי תּוֹרַת מִלְכָּה, chap. xxiii. 25. This expression is never used of a portion, or of a single one, of the books of Moses, so that it proves that the "book" which was found could not be, as has often been supposed, the book of Deuteronomy. That book was certainly contained in it, for it was the "threats" contained in that book (Deut. xxviii.) which made such a deep impression on the king (ver. 11), and which were affirmed by the prophetess (ver. 16). It, however, presupposes the other books, and never formed a separate book by itself.

Josiah certainly could not renew the covenant on the basis of one book only, but only on the basis of the whole book of the law (chap. xxiii. 1-3). The opinion that this book was Deuteronomy alone has, therefore, been almost universally abandoned, and Bertheau justly observes of this opinion (Zur Gesch. Jer. s. 375): It "lacks all foundation, and only rests upon favorite assumptions, which cannot stand before a critical science which examines more carefully." It is now commonly assumed that "the law-book was a document which formed the basis of Deuteronomy at the final redaction" (Hitzig on Jerom. xi. s. 90), or that it was a "collection of the commands and ordinances of Moses which has been since incorporated in the Pentateuch, especially in Deuteronomy" (Thenius on the place), or that it was "a collection of the laws of Moses; in fact, that formally arranged collection of them which is contained in the three middle books of the Pentateuch" (Bertheau on 2 Chron. xxxiv. 14). But there is not the slightest hint of any such "collection" as existing before, or by the side of, the Pentateuch; much less is there any hint that any such collection was designated as "the book of the Law," or "the book of the Covenant." It is a pure hypothesis in which refuge has been sought, because, on the one hand, it was impossible to understand by the newly discovered "book" any one of the books of the Pentateuch; while, on the other hand, it was believed that the composition of the Pentateuch must be ascribed to a later date. This is not the place for an investigation into the origin of the Pentateuch. We simply hold firmly to this, on the authority of the text before us, that the newly discovered book was the entire Pentateuch. De Wette, even, declares (Einleit. § 162, a): "The discovery of the book of the law in the temple in the reign of Josiah is the first (?) certain hint which we find of the existence of the Pentateuch as we have it to-day."

[In the above discussion there are two points involved: (a) the general question of the date of the origin of Deuteronomy, and (b) the especial evidence of the text before us on that question. I dismiss the former point with the following remarks. (a) It is a question of great scope, involving the examination of many texts (very few of which are mentioned above), and calling for a comprehensive treatment. Such an undertaking is out of place and impossible here. (b) This question requires freedom, and scholarly independence from dogmatic prepossessions, for its discussion. It requires also thorough and wide knowledge of a variety of subjects. It cannot be settled by any arbitrary and dogmatic assertions. (c) The reasons which are adduced for believing in the comparatively late origin of the book of Deuteronomy, if not convincing, are at least such as to demand the candid consideration of honest scholars. (For the summary of the arguments on either side see the Introductory Essays in the COMMENTARY on GENESIS, and the articles "Pentateuch" and "Deuteronomy," in Smith's Dictionary of the Bible.)

The other question, as to the bearing of this verse on the question of the date of the origin of Deuteronomy, is in place here, but, in fact, the text bears little or no evidence on that point. The reasons for thinking that Deuteronomy was not written by Moses, but at some time long after his death, are critical and independent of the verse before us. When this opinion had gained ground the question arose, when was it written? then attention was turned to this passage, and it was suspected that this was the time of its publication, if not of its composition. Then the text was tortured to try to make it bear evidence either to confirm or overthrow this suspicion. There is evidence to this point drawn from other sources, but the text before us yields none to either side.

(a) In the first place, "the Book of the Law" is a name which may have referred at one time to the Decalogue, at another time to a collection of laws, at another time to a still later revision, and so on until it was applied finally to the Pentateuch in its present form, and so came down to us with that meaning. This is what the "critical school" affirm to have been the fact, and so far as the name, "The Book of the Law" goes, it is not inconsistent with that assertion. The "Revised Statutes" of a State, at any given time, means the volume of law as fixed, up to that time. Ten years later, the same title refers, perhaps, to a very different set of laws. The illustration answers rudely for the development which is supposed to have taken place from the original writings of Moses to the historical, political, religious, and ritual work which now bears his name. We have some indications of the extent of what is called "the Law of Moses," in the time which seems to have been required for reading it, but they are vague and uncertain. In Josh. viii. 32, however, we read that Joshua "wrote there upon the stones a copy of the law of Moses, which he wrote in the presence of the children of Israel." Probably no one will think that, in this case, it refers to the Pentateuch. Therefore, in the verse before us, "the Book of the Law" refers to whatever was so considered, or passed as such at this period, but what that was is exactly the point in dispute.

(b) The word סֵפֶר, as was said above, is used for different kinds of finding. It does not, therefore, give us any clue as to whether the thing found was an old thing, whose location had not, for some time, been known, or a thing which had not previously been known to be in existence at all. However, no one believes that nothing had previously existed, or been known to exist, which passed under the name of the "Law of the Lord." The question in dispute is, whether the thing now so designated was identical with what had previously been so called, or was a revision and extension of the same, containing especially, as a recent addition, the book of Deuteronomy. On that question the word סֵפֶר casts no light.

(c) Hilkiah uses the definite article. Let us endeavor to realize the state of things, and see what inference flows from this fact. We know that, at this time, certain religious doctrines were known and believed, and certain rites of worship were practised in Judah by those who maintained the worship of Jehovah. We also know (so much, at least, no one disputes) that Moses had given certain revelations of religious truth, and certain religious ordinances to the Israelites, in the name of Jehovah, and had written them down. The only dispute on these points can be as to the degree of knowledge, faith, and worship which existed in Judah, and as to the amount of revelation and law which Moses gave and wrote. It follows that the writings of Moses, either in their original, or in a modified and extended form, served as the authority for the doctrine and worship which still remained in Judah, or else, that this written law had passed from human knowledge, lost in the flood of heathenism which had poured over the nation during the last century, in which case the doctrine and worship which remained would be based on a tradition of the ancient writings as such; and the name "The Law" would refer only to the substance of them, so far as it was remembered. Hilkiah's announcement throws light on this alternative. If he had said: I have found a book of the Law,—it would have implied that he had found a copy of a generally well known volume. But he says: I have found "the Book of the Law." He refers to it as something known or heard of before, yet the tone of the announcement and the effect of the discovery show that no other copies of this book could have been known to be in existence, or else that this copy was different from all others. If the latter were the case, the suspicion would be forced upon us, by the reference to "threats" in the book, that what marked this copy, as distinguished from all others, was just the book of Deuteronomy. Many scholars so regard the incident. However, it is strange that, if other copies existed, while this copy contained matter which was missing from them, no hint of this should be found in the context. How was it that no one produced a copy of the "Law," or challenged the new copy as a forgery? Or, if it passed at once as genuine, because it was not in the "spirit of the age" to be critical about literary authorship, and if it was well known, from easy comparison with existing copies, that this copy gave new and valuable knowledge of the Law, why do we find no hint of this gain? The argument from silence is never conclusive, but in this case it is very strong. It seems rather that Hilkiah refers, by his words, to a book which was unique, so far as his, or the general public knowledge went, and that he meant to announce the discovery of the Book which contained that Law which was known to them by tradition, which formed the basis of their faith and worship, of whose existence, at a former time, in a written codex, they had also heard, but of which they possessed no written copy.

The only true inference from this text is, therefore, this, that during the time of apostasy the Scriptures had been lost to public knowledge, and "the Law" existed only as a tradition and memory. This leaves us face to face with the question: Of what did "this book of the Law" consist,—of our Pentateuch, or of some imperfect form of what we now call the Pentateuch? We must look for the answer to that question elsewhere. We shall not find it in this verse.—W. G. S.]

As for the particular copy of the book which was found, the Rabbis and many of the old expositors, Grotius, Piscator, Hess, and others inferred from the words 2 Chron. xxxiv. 14: "The book of the law of Jehovah כִּתְּבֵי הַבְּרִית," that it was "the original manuscript from the hand of Moses," and Calmet was of the opinion that this supposition could alone account for the great effect which the discovery produced. In Numb. xv. 23 we find the same expression, but there it cannot possibly be understood literally of the "hand" of Moses. It is used in the sense in which we often find כִּתְּבֵי elsewhere (1 Kings xii. 15; Jer. xxxvii.

2), simply to denote the medium through which Clericus' statement is correct: Satis est, exemplar quoddam Legis antiquum fuisse, idque authenticum. As it was found "in the house of Jehovah," it was most probably the temple-copy, i. e., the official one which, as the documentary testimony to the covenant, was deposited in the temple, according to Deut. xxxi. 12, 26, and was used for public reading from time to time before the people. Perhaps this copy was distinguished by its external appearance, size, material, beauty of the writing, &c., from the ordinary private copies. [The passage in Deuteronomy must then be interpreted as a general injunction always to keep a copy in the tabernacle or temple, an interpretation which a glance will show to be incorrect, and it is assumed that there were private copies in existence. If private copies of "the Book of the Law" were common, or if a single one was known to be in existence, then we cannot understand why the discovery produced such a sensation, unless indeed we suppose that the newly discovered copy contained something which the other copies did not. In that case the reference to the "threats" contained in the book, as one of its prominent characteristics, would awaken the gravest suspicion that what it contained over and above the other copies was just the book of Deuteronomy. There is no reason to believe that private copies existed, and the definite article סֵפֶר הַתּוֹרָה bears witness to the contrary, as above stated.—W. G. S.] It is nowhere stated when and how this official copy was thrown aside and lost sight of. According to the tradition of the rabbis, this took place under Ahaz, who, they say, caused all the copies to be burned, but Kimchi justly objected that the reformation under Hezekiah presupposed the existence of the Law-book, and acquaintance with it. The supposition is therefore naturally suggested that under the fanatical idolater Manasseh, who sought to destroy all Jehovah-worship, and who reigned for fifty-five years, some faithful servant of Jehovah, perhaps the high-priest himself, took care to conceal and preserve the sacred Scriptures, and that the book only came to light again at the repairing of the temple under Josiah, after sixty or seventy years of concealment. During this period the priests "followed an imperfect tradition in their execution of the public worship of Jehovah, instead of being guided by the legal prescriptions" (Von Gerlach), and "it may be that the active practice of religious observances (which we must take for granted as existing in a well-ordered State) saved them from feeling the necessity for written rules" (Winer, R.-W.-B. I. s. 610). The discovery of the authentic Law-book was all the more important on this account, for by means of it the pure and correct worship of Jehovah could now be re-established. The idle question, where the book was found? whether under the roof, or under a heap of stones, or in one of the treasure chambers, may be left to the rabbis to contend over.

Ver. 11. When the king had heard the words of the book of the law, &c. Shaphan did not read to the king the whole book, but he read therein (2 Chron. xxxiv. 18: יָצָא). Judging from the impression which the words made upon the king (rending one's clothes is a sign of the deepest anxiety and terror; see chap. vi. 30; xix. 1), those passages seem to have been read in which the transgressors of the law are threatened with the harshest punishments; such, for instance, as Deut. xxviii. "Perhaps the last part of the book-roll was unrolled first" (Richter).—The king now sends a deputation of his highest officers, as Hezekiah had done in similar uncertainty, to inquire of the Lord; not, as Duncker (Gesch. des Alt. I. s. 504) states, "in order to find out whether this really was the law of Moses," but rather, because the genuineness of the book appears to him to be beyond question, he sends to inquire whether and how the punishments which are threatened may be averted. "He desires to learn whether the measure of sin is already full or whether there is yet hope of grace" (Von Gerlach). Only a prophetic declaration—the word of the Lord—could give him an answer to this question. Ahikam appears afterwards as the friend and protector of Jeremiah (Jer. xxvi. 24), and as father of Gedaliah, the governor of the cities of Judah (Jer. xl. 5). Achbor is called, 2 Chron. xxxiv. 20, Abdon, perhaps only by a mistake of the letter characters. According to Jerem. xxvi. 22; xxxvi. 12, he was the father of Elnathan, who belonged to the most intimate associates of king Zedekiah. Asahiah, who is only mentioned here, is spoken of as "the servant of the king," that is, as an officer in his immediate service.—Unto Huldah, the prophetess (ver. 14). The king had commanded the deputation to inquire of the Lord without directing them to go to any particular person. The reason why they sought her is probably hinted at in the remark which is added, and which in itself appears unimportant, that "she lived in Jerusalem." The two prophets who made their appearance during Josiah's reign were Jeremiah and Zephaniah. The former came from Anathoth in Benjamin (Jer. i. 1). He was probably at this time still in that city. The latter, according to Pseudoepiphanius (De prophet. 19), belonged to the tribe of Simeon and came ἀπὸ δρυὸς Σαπαθαδά. The deputation went to Huldah because she was the only one at Jerusalem who had the gift of prophecy. In order to show that she was a person of good position, not only the name and office of her husband are given, but also the name of two of his ancestors. He was keeper of the wardrobe, "either of the royal wardrobe, or of that of the sanctuary; the latter is more probable on comparing 2 Kings x. 22" (Bertheau). "In the second part," i. e., in the lower city. See Nehem. xi. 9; Zeph. i. 10. Josephus: ἀλλῇ πόλει. Thenius: "In the second district of the (lower) city, which was afterwards included within the walls." [He thus identifies it with a small hill which formed the extreme north-western suburb of the city.]

Ver. 15. And she said unto them, &c. She addressed her reply in the first place to the man that sent you (vers. 15-17), afterwards to the king of Judah which sent you (vers. 18-20). The first part was addressed not only to the king but to "every one who would hear;" the second part was addressed to the king especially (Keil). This is more simple and natural than Thenius' notion: "In the first part, Huldah has only the subject matter in mind, while in ver. 18, in the quieter (?) flow of her words, she takes notice of the state of mind of the particular person who sent to make the inquiry."—All the words of the book (ver. 16), stands in apposition with רָאָה which precedes. In Chronicles we find instead: "All the curses that are written in the book which they have read before the king of Judah" (xxxiv.

24). הַיְּהוּדִים in ver. 18 is not to be connected with what follows: "Thy heart was tender on account of these words" (Luther), but it is to be taken as a nominative absolute: as for the words which, &c. The sense of vers. 18 and 19 is: Because thou hast heard me and taken heed to my threats, I will also hear thee and not fulfil these threats upon thee. קָךְ is to be taken here in the sense of amid, Deut. xx. 8; Jer. li. 46. The threats had awakened terror and dismay in him.—A desolation and a curse, see Jerem. xlv. 22. The fact that Josiah was slain in battle (chap. xxiii. 29) does not contradict בָּשָׁלֹם in ver. 20.

That only means to say that he should die "without surviving the desolation of Jerusalem, as we see from the added promise: thine eyes shall not see, &c." (Keil). According to 2 Chron. xxxv. 24, 25, Josiah was laid in the sepulchre with high honors, followed by the lamentations of the whole people.

Chap. xxiii. ver. 1. And the king sent and they gathered unto him, &c. Although the king had received an answer which was favorable only in its bearings on himself, his first care was to bring together the entire people, to make them acquainted with the law-book, to lead them to repent, and so to avert as far as possible the threatened punishment. In ver. 2 all the classes of the population are mentioned in order to show how much Josiah had it at heart that the entire people, without distinction of rank or class, should become acquainted with the Law. Among these classes the priests and prophets are mentioned. Keil supposes that Jeremiah and Zephaniah were among these "in order that they might, by their participation, accomplish the renewal of the covenant, and that the prophets might then undertake the task of bringing home to the hearts of the people, by earnest preaching in Jerusalem and the cities of Judah, the obligations of the covenant." If that had been so, however, the prophets could not have been merely incidentally mentioned, but they would have been especially pointed out as prominent agents in the work. The נְבִיאִים, who here stand with the priests and form one class with them, are evidently not the prophets in the narrower and more especial sense [i. e., as persons who foretold future events and pronounced the oracles of God], but the word is a general designation of the persons whose duty it was to preach and to explain the Law. The Chronicler (xxxiv. 30) has instead הַלְוִיִּם, which is no contradiction or arbitrary alteration, for it was the duty and calling of the house of Levi to preach and to interpret the Law (Deut. xvii. 18; xxxi. 9 sq.; xxxiii. 10; 2 Chron. xvii. 8, 9; xxxv. 3); the Chaldee paraphrase therefore interprets נְבִיאִים here by סֹפְרֵי, γραμματεῖς.

[What we understand by "interpretation of the law" did not exist until after the captivity. The levites are represented in Deuteronomy as the guardians and readers of the Law, and in Chronicles we find them charged with its publication, but nowhere are they represented as doing what the "scribes" did at a later time. That is an interpretation of the rabbis which is borrowed from their own time, and is unhistorical as applied to this text. Neither were the prophets divided into two classes, one of which was charged with the office of interpretation. There is no evidence of such a division, or of such a duty of the prophets. Certainly if the duty of interpreting the Law had been given by Moses to the levites, the whole spirit of the Israelitish constitution forbids us to believe that other persons—prophets—persons of every tribe, could have interfered with that duty or shared in it. We cannot thus reconcile our text with that of Chronicles.—We may get a correct idea of the incident referred to by observing: (a) that the class of prophets was, at this time, very large. The name נְבִיא applies to them all. No distinction is made, and the name is even applied to false prophets, whether with an epithet, marking them as false (Ez. xiii. 2 and 3; Isai. ix. 14; Jerem. vi. 13, &c.), or without any such epithet (Hos. iv. 5; ix. 7, 8). The same name is given to the "prophets" of Baal. The original meaning of the word is speaker or orator, but it is essential to the idea of a נְבִיא in the O. T. that he speaks under the influence of divine illumination or inspiration. He may be false, and pretend to an illumination which he has not, or he may speak in the name of a false god, but, as one who claims and pretends to illumination, he is a נְבִיא. (b) There were schools in which persons were trained to this office and work. Originally such persons were few in number, but the book of Jeremiah shows conclusively that, in the time of that prophet, they were numerous, and that many had the name without the spirit. Many were called, but few chosen. (c) The aim of the schools of the prophets was to nourish faith in Jehovah and worship of Him; to cultivate men who preserved the traditions of the Jehovah religion, perpetuated the great doctrines which the prophets continually reiterate, and cultivated insight into divine truth. (d) The schools could do no more than spend their labor on those who offered themselves for the work. The truth of their calling could only appear in their subsequent work. Hence the authority of the prophets was nothing more or less than their divine calling, which manifested itself in their later labors. In fact, it was not until Isaiah and Jeremiah had been long dead that their labors were ratified and could be estimated. (e) The words or writings of the fifteen or sixteen whose works remain to us comprise, if we may so speak, only the cream of the prophetic utterances of centuries. (f) The prophets never base their teachings on Moses, but teach originally. They do not say: Thus saith Moses. They do not quote the Pentateuch as an authority. They never impress their commands by quoting the "Law of Moses" as the supreme authority of faith and duty. If they did, their works would not be Holy Scripture, but commentaries, or, at most, sermons. On the contrary, they say: Thus saith the Lord. Their work is original and creative; it is not merely in the way of application or reflexion. When they quote the "Law of the Lord" they quote principles and doctrines which were fundamental in the Israelitish constitution. They do not refer to specific ordinances and enactments, but to the spirit and principles of the Jehovah-religion. We have an analogy in the frequent reference in modern sermons to "the will of God." This refers only generally to the Bible, and includes those things also which are not specifically ordained in the Bible, but which a Christian conscience recognizes as God's will. (g) It is, therefore, an error to attempt to enhance the character and authority of the great prophets by supposing that, during their life-time, they were separated from others of their class. (h) It is also an error to suppose that they held any insubordinate or independent place in the body politic. We admire these men who rebuked kings, and dictated public policy in great crises, but we do them injustice if we believe that, on ordinary occasions, and in ordinary duties, they emancipated themselves from the obligations of subjects of the kingdom.—In the present case the text shows us the place of the prophets. They ranked with the priests as religious persons. If Jeremiah was in Jerusalem we may be sure that he took his place, simply and without ostentation, among his comrades in station and calling. We do not need to invent any special reason for the presence of the prophets. They were there simply as a class amongst the multitude assembled. (i) It is also an error to reconcile the text of Kings with that of Chronicles by identifying the levites, in function, with the prophets, or any class of the prophets. In the time of the chronicler the prophets had ceased to exist, certainly as a class. He was accustomed to see levites in this place by the side of the priests on such occasions, and that is the simple reason why he mentions them as occupying that place in the present instance.—W. G. S.]

Both small and great. This does not mean both the children and the grown-up persons, but, both the lower classes and the people of distinction. No doubt the king left to the priests or prophets the duty of reading the book, but himself took the oath of fidelity to the covenant from the people. He therefore took his place upon the platform (see notes on xi. 14).

Ver. 4. And the king commanded Hilkiah the high priest, &c. As in chap. xi. 17, 18, the conclusion of the covenant was followed by the extirpation of idolatry, first by the removal of the utensils of this cultus (ver 4), then by the execution of the priests of it (ver 5), then by the destruction and desecration of the places in which it was practised (ver. 6 sq.). כְּהֲנֵי הַמִּזְבֵּחַ are not, as the rabbis say, the deputies of the high-priest, but, in contrast with him, the younger and subordinate priests. See 1 Chron. xv. 18; 2 Chron. xxxi. 12; 1 Sam. viii. 2. The keepers of the door are the levites whose duty it was to guard the temple (chap. xxii. 4; 1 Chron. xxiii. 5). On Baal and Ashera and upon the host of heaven, see notes on chap. xxi. 3 [also notes on chap. xvi. 3 and xvii. 17]. This burning took place in obedience to Deut. vii. 25; xii. 3. It was accomplished outside of Jerusalem, because the things were unclean, on the fields of the Kidron, north-east of the city, where the Kidron valley is broader than between Jerusalem and the Mount of Olives. Asa had caused an idol to be burned there (1 Kings xv. 13), and Hezekiah caused all the impure things which were found in the temple to be carried thither (2 Chron. xxix. 16). Not even the ashes, however, might remain there. They were carried to Bethel, certainly for no other reason than because that had been the chief place of origin for all idolatrous and illegitimate worship ever since the time of Jehoabam (1 Kings xii. 53). That which had proceeded from thence Josiah sent back thither—in ashes. Thenius' conjecture: בֵּית-אֵל, he carried the ashes into the house of nothingness, i. e., he scattered them on all the winds, is, to say the least, unnecessary.

Ver. 5. And he caused to desist the idolatrous priests, &c. Not, he caused to perish, put to death (Sept. κατέκτανε; Vulg. delevit), but, he caused to cease, or set aside. The word מְקַרְיִים occurs besides only in Hos. x. 5 and Zeph. i. 4. The etymology of the word is uncertain. The rabbis derive it from כָּמַר, nigredo, because they wore black garments, but we have no instance of priests who wore black garments, and this etymology is certainly false. According to Gesenius it comes from כָּמַר, to execute or accomplish, and means the celebrant (of the sacred offices), ἐπιδου, sacrificer. [This is Keil's opinion, not Gesenius'. The latter, in the Thesaurus s. v. follows the etymology above ascribed to the rabbis. He says that it means "blackness, sadness, and so, concretely, one who walks in black garments, i. e., a grieving, sad, ascetic, priest." As it is only used of the priests of false worship, it would be very remarkable that the name applied to them should mean, strictly, ascetics.—W. G. S.] Fürst connects it with the Arabic chamar=cohit deum, hence, one who serves, a servant. It certainly refers to a kind of priests, not necessarily of idols, for in Hos. x. 5 the priests of Jeroboam's Jehovah-calf-worship are so called, and here they are distinguished from those who offered incense to Baal. Probably it refers to those who, without actually being priests, exercised sacerdotal functions either in the service of the calves or of false divinities. Baal "serves as a designation of the entire cultus which was covered by his name, as if it were said: Baal, i. e., the sun, &c." (Thenius). The מִקְוֹת, from מָקָל, lodging, dwelling, station, are the twelve divisions of the Zodiac marked by the figures and names of animals; the twelve constellations of the Zodiac, which are called in Job xxxviii. 22 מִקְוֹת (see Gesen. Thes. II. 869). הָאִשְׁרָה (ver. 6), means not one but many Astarte-statues which Manasseh had set up in the temple (chap. xxi. 7). If he removed them after his return from Babylon (2 Chron. xxxiii. 15), they were reinstated by Amon.—On the graves of the common people. The chronicler says: "On the graves of those who had sacrificed to them" (the false gods). Evidently this is a gloss added by the chronicler himself. Persons of the common folk [as the text reads literally] are not worshippers of false gods, but common people. These did not have hereditary sepulchres hewn out of the rock (Winer, R.-W.-B.-I. 444), as the rich and noble had. They were buried in the open fields where the corpses were more likely to be dug up by wild animals. The present burying-place of the Jews is in the Kidron valley. It is evident from Jerem. xxvi. 23 that this burial was not disgraceful, although it was less honorable than that in a rock-hewn sepulchre. If this had been the burying-place for idol-worshippers, it would have been the usual burying-place in the time of Manasseh, whereas at that time it was rather the faithful servants of Jehovah who were dishonorably buried. Josiah's reason for throwing the ashes on these graves was, therefore, not "to desecrate them as the graves of idolaters" (Keil), but in order still further to dishonor the ashes of the destroyed idols.—On הַתְּרָשִׁים (ver. 7) see note on 1 Kings

xiv. 24. Only male prostitutes, not female (Thenius) can be understood. They had their dwellings (tents or cabins) near the temple, perhaps in the outer court. In these also dwelt the women who wove בְּתִים for the Ashera. Whether these were "tents," and, if so, of what kind they were (hardly, as Ewald thinks, "garments" [he alters the text and reads בְּנָרִים Gesch. III. 718]) is not clear. Chap. xvii. 30 does not throw any light on it. Movers (Phæn. I. s. 686) says: "The castrated male prostitute (קִרְטִי) imagines or pretends that he is a woman: *negant se viros esse * * * mulieres se volunt credi*. Firmic. He lives in association with women, and the latter, in their turn, have a peculiar inclination towards him."

Ver. 8. And he brought all the priests out of the cities of Judah. Vers. 8 and 9 belong together. The true levitical priests, who exercised their functions on the high places instead of in the temple, he caused to come to Jerusalem in order to make them desist from this. He caused the high-places to be made unfit for use by desecrating them. However, these priests, since they had forfeited their priestly dignity, were not allowed to perform priestly offices in the temple. They were employed simply as levites. They were allowed to eat unleavened, or sacrificial, bread, but not in company with the other priests (cf. Ezek. xlii. 10-14). They were, therefore, placed in the same category with those sons of Aaron who were prevented by some physical defect from undertaking the hereditary functions of their family (Levit. xxi. 21). It is not stated in the text that they continued to be participes emolumentorum sacerdotalium (Clericus).—From Geba to Beersheba, that is, throughout the entire kingdom. Geba is the Gibeon in the territory of Benjamin, near Ramah, the home of Saul. See notes on 1 Kings xv. 22, and Knobel on Isaiah x. 29. It is mentioned as the northern limit. Beersheba is mentioned as the southernmost and last seat of illegal worship (Amos v. 5; viii. 15).—The high-places of the gates were places of worship (in this case simply altars), either close to the gates, or, since these were large open buildings for public meetings and intercourse (Nahum viii. 16; Ruth iii. 11; Prov. xxii. 22), even inside of them. Probably these altars served for the foreigners as they came in or went out to offer sacrifices of prayer or of thanksgiving in reference to the transactions in which they were about to engage, or which they had just completed. The two following clauses, each of which begins with וְאֵשֶׁר, define these high-places more nearly, and it is not admissible to supply præsertim or imprimis (Clericus, Dathe, Maurer) before the first וְאֵשֶׁר, and then to regard the second relative as referring to this. How can we comprehend the description of a high-place which was at the entrance of the gate of Joshua, and at the same time on the left hand of the gate of the city? As reference is made to two high-places in two different gates, the verse cannot be otherwise understood than as it is interpreted by Thenius: "He tore down the high-places of the gates, (the high-place) which was at the entrance of the gate of Joshua (as well as that) which was on the left hand in the gate of the city." So also Keil and Ewald. Neither of these gates is mentioned anywhere else, at least by the same name. Thenius locates the former in the inside of the city, because he assumes that the governor of the city must have lived in the citadel, Millo, and that this gate must have been one which connected the lower city with the citadel, and was close to his dwelling. This gate was called, in later times, Gennath. This, however, is a pure guess. The "gate of the city" may have been the valley-gate, or the Jaffa-gate, on the west side of the city towards the valley of Gihon, through which the traffic with the Mediterranean passed.

Ver. 10. And he defiled Topheth. הַתֹּפֶת is a special designation of the spot in the valley of Hinnom, south of the city, where, during the time of apostasy, children were sacrificed to Moloch. In Isaiah xxx. 33 this place is called the "pyre." Fürst derives the word from the unused root תָּפַח, to burn up. The majority of the expositors, however, derive it from תָּפַח, to spit or vomit, that is, to detest, hold in abhorrence. תֹּפֶת would then mean abomination (see Röddiger in Gesenius' Thesaurus, p. 1497). The place either had this name from the time of Josiah, who defiled it by burning there the bones of the dead (ver. 16), or else it was thus named still earlier, by the faithful servants of Jehovah, on account of the detestation they felt for the abominable child-sacrifices which were practised there. Hitzig and Böttcher take הַנָּחַל as an appellative from הָנַח, to groan, and translate: "Valley of the wailings of children."—And he took away the horses, ver. 11. The same expressions are used here in regard to the horses as in ver. 5 in regard to the בְּקָרִים. They were given (נָתַן), that is, established or instituted, and he took them away (שָׁבַת). Both expressions must therefore be understood here as they are there. He did away with the horses, but did with the chariots as he had done with the idol-images (ver. 6), he burned them (שָׂרַף). If the horses had been of wood he would have burned them also. It follows that they were living horses. Horses are often mentioned as animals sacred to the sun among Oriental peoples (see the proofs quoted in Bochart, Hieroz. I. 2, 10). Horses were not only sacrificed to the sun, as the supreme divinity (Herod. i. 216), but they were also used to draw the sacred chariot (Curt. iii. 3, 11; see Herod. i. 189). This latter was the purpose for which they were kept here. They served to draw the sacred chariot in solemn processions, representing the course of the sun through the zodiac, not, as Keil asserts, following the rabbis, "to go forth to meet the rising sun." [This custom of keeping horses sacred to the sun is connected with the idea of the sun as a flaming chariot drawn through the heavens. Hence horses and a car were kept on earth as sacred to, and symbolical of, the sun.] וְנָחַל is not to be translated, as it is by De Wette: "so that they came no more into the house of Jehovah," nor is it to be connected with וַיִּשְׁבֹּת (he removed them from the entrance of the temple), but it states where the place was where the horses were ordinarily kept: from the coming into the house, that is, when any one came into the temple (through the western or rear door of the fore-court, the gate שַׁלְכָה, 1 Chron. xxvi. 16), the place of the horses was on the side of him to or towards (אֵל) the chamber of Nathan-melech. This chamber was בְּפָרְוִים. The לְשֹׁכֹת in the outer court (see notes on 1 Kings vi. 36) were side rooms which served for different purposes; not only as dwellings for the priests who were on duty (Ezek. xl. 45 sq.), but also as store-rooms for different materials (1 Chron. ix. 26; 2 Chron. xxxi. 12). This chamberlain (chap. xx. 18), Nathan-Melech, of whom nothing further is known, was, no doubt, charged with the care of the sacred horses. It is impossible to decide whether the לְשֹׁכָה was his dwelling, and the stable of the horses was near by (Thenius), or whether this chamber itself was arranged as a stable for them (Keil). No one disputes that פָּרֹךְ is the same as פָּרְכָר, 1 Chron. xxvi. 18. In the latter place the divisions of the gate-keepers of the temple are stated in vers. 12-19. As these had their posts only in and near the temple, and two of them were especially appointed for the פָּרְכָר, the word cannot mean stables (the rabbis and De Wette), nor any other locality outside of the fore-court of the temple. The ordinary interpretation of the word as the colonnade (Gesenius, Bunsen) is also excluded, for the Parbar is distinctly designated in the place quoted as lying on the west or rear side of the temple, where certainly it is least likely that a colonnade was built which formed the feature distinguishing that side from the others. [Bähr, in his translation, renders פָּרְכָר by in den Säulenhallen, in the colonnades.]

We have rather to think of some specially marked space on the west side, inside of the fore-court. Of the six watchmen who were posted at the west side, four had posts assigned them on the street, that is, at the gate which led to the street, and only two in the Parbar. The latter must therefore have been inside the court, otherwise it could not have been left to the weaker guard. It is not stated what particular use this space, called the Parbar, was put to. We can only suppose that it was used for purposes for which the other sides of the court were not well adapted. The more specific details as to the size of the space, the wall by which it was surrounded, &c., which Thenius gives in his notes on the passage, are the result of mere combinations.

Ver. 12. And the altars that were on the top of the upper chamber of Ahaz. The עֲלֵיהָ of Ahaz was certainly not the upper chamber which was above the sanctuary of the temple (see notes on 1 Kings vi. 20), but only a chamber which was first erected by this idolatrous king, and which was probably over one of the outbuildings in the fore-court, which, according to Jerem. xxxv. 4, at least some of them, had different stories one above another. Perhaps it was over a gate. It probably served for observations on the stars, and the altars were for the worship of the constellations (Zeph. i. 5; Jerem. xix. 13). [It therefore proves that the Assyrio-Chaldean star-worship was introduced in the time of Ahaz and Pekah. See notes on chap. xvi. 3 and xvii. 17, above, pp. 169 and 186.] He tore down the altars which Manasseh had made (chap. xxi. 5). נָחַץ is used as in verse 7.

Keil translates the following נָחַץ: "He crushed them from thence," taking it from נָחַץ, to crush, pulverize, and making it equivalent to נָחַץ in ver. 6. But מָסַח does not coincide well with the notion of crushing, which, moreover, is fully expressed in נָחַץ. It must be taken from נָחַץ, to run, in the sense of to hasten (Isai. lix. 7); he hastened thence since he had yet all the high-places outside of Jerusalem to destroy (ver. 13). The Chaldean paraphrase explains it by וְנָחַץ מִמָּוֶה, that is, he removed from thence (Pa. lxxxviii. 19); the Sept.: kai kateilev autā ēkeiθεν. Thenius therefore agrees with Kimchi in reading נָחַץ: "He caused to run—and cast, &c., that is, He gave orders to remove and cast with all haste, &c. (Jerem. xlix. 19). In this case he probably cast the débris directly over the wall of the temple enclosure down into the valley." And the high-places that were before Jerusalem, &c. Vers. 13 and 14 are a direct continuation of ver. 12, and they state what Josiah did in regard to the high-places before the city, which had existed long before Ahaz and Manasseh. On these high-places, see notes on 1 Kings xi. 7. The Mount of Corruption is the southernmost peak of the Mount of Olives which lay to the East (עֶלְ-פְּנֵי) of Jerusalem. It received this name on account of the idolatry which was practised there. Among Christians it is now called, Mount of Offence, mons offensionis, which the Vulg. has in the place before us. On the images and Astarte-statues (ver. 14) see notes on 1 Kings

xiv. 23. מְקוֹמָם does not mean "their elevated pedestals" (Thenius), for יִמֵּיהֶם would not fit into this meaning, but, in general, their places. It is to be observed that it is not said in reference to Solomon's high-places (in ver. 13) that he tore them down, as it is said of those which were of later origin (vers. 6, 7, 8, 12), but only that he defiled them. No doubt this is because they had been already torn down by Hezekiah, or perhaps even before his time (2 Chron. xxxi. 1). He only defiled the places where they had been (perhaps some parts were still remaining) in order to obliterate thoroughly all the false worship. Thenius is certainly mistaken when he asserts: "The idol-temples which Solomon had erected remained until the time of Josiah, though they were several times, e. g., under Hezekiah, placed under interdict." How could Hezekiah, who even removed the heights where Jehovah was worshipped (chap. xviii. 4), have allowed idol-temples to stand untouched, with their images, over against Jerusalem? [As far as the text gives any information in regard to the matter, either here or elsewhere, Solomon's heights, &c., remained until this time. The inference as to what other reformers must have done, is only an inference. If we allow ourselves to infer that such and such things had been done before this time, we obliterate those peculiarities of Josiah's reformation which make it especially interesting.—

W. G. S.] We do not need to assume, as Menochius does: Ab impiis regibus excitata sunt sana et idola is similia, quæ excitaverat Salomon isdem locis, ideoque Salomoni tribuuntur primo illorum auctori.

Ver. 15. Moreover the altar that was at Beth-el.—After Josiah had put an end to all illegal worship in Judah, he extended the reformation to the former kingdom of Israel, whence that worship had originally sprung, and where it had been made the basis of the political constitution (1 Kings xii. 26 sq.). It is told in vers. 15–20 what he did there. From the time of Jeroboam Bethel had been the chief seat of the calf-worship (1 Kings xii. 28; xiii. 1; Amos iii. 14; vii. 10, 13; Jerem. xlviii. 13; see Hos. x. 5). This altar was the one mentioned in 1 Kings xii. 33 and xiii. 1. The first בֵּיתֵל in ver. 15 cannot be taken as an accusative of place, "on the high-place," as Thénien takes it, but only as apposition to "altar." The Bamah was a house on an elevation, for he tore it down and burned it. The altar did not stand in the house, but before it. In what follows the statement is clearer: "that altar and the high-place." After the immigration of the heathen colonists an Astarte-statue seems to have taken the place of the calf-image there.—On ver. 16 sq. see the Prælim. Rem. on 1 Kings xiii. Vers. 16 to 18 belong, according to Stähelin (Krit. Untersuch. s. 156), to the author and not to the document which served him as authority. According to Thénien they are taken from the sequel to 1 Kings xiii. 1–32. This, he says, is evident "from וְהָיָה in

ver. 19, which corresponds to that in ver. 15, and, still more distinctly, from the consideration that Josiah could not defile the altar by burning men's bones upon it (ver. 16) after he had broken it in pieces (ver. 15)." But, if the remarkable incident in vers. 16 to 18 was to be narrated, it could not be mentioned anywhere but here, because it took place at the destruction of the high-place at Bethel. Ver. 19 then carries on the history of the destruction and extirpation of the illegal cultus throughout Samaria, and goes on to tell what was done elsewhere than at Bethel. As for the difficulty about the altar, the author must have been very careless to make a statement in ver. 16 which was inconsistent with what he had said in ver. 15. He says nothing in ver. 15 about burning the altar, but only about burning the house and the Astarte-statue. He caused bones to be burned on the spot where the altar had stood in order that that also might become unclean and never more be fit for an altar, i. e., for a place of worship. The author, no doubt, in many ways made use of old authorities and incorporated them into his work, but he certainly never thoughtlessly patched separate pieces together, or arbitrarily inserted a bit here and there.

—He turned himself, i. e., to look about; cf. Exod. ii. 12; xvi. 10. The "mount," where the sepulchres were, cannot be the one on which the altar and the Bamah stood, but one in the neighborhood, which was to be seen from the one where the Bamah stood. After וְהָיָה the Sept. have the words: "When Jeroboam, at the festival, stood at the altar, and he turned his eyes upon the sepulchre of the man of God who had spoken these words." Thénien regards this addition as originally having belonged to the perfect text, but it may easily be recognized as a gloss.—Ver. 17. What grave-stone is that? The sepulchres of prominent persons were marked by monuments placed before them (Ezek. xxxix. 15; Gen. xxxv. 20; Jerem. xxxi. 21). This monument attracted the king's attention and he asked whom it commemorated.—Ver. 18. Out of Samraia. The name here refers not to the city but to the country, and stands in contrast with the words "from Judah" in ver. 17. It therefore marks the origin of this prophet; "he was an Israelitish, not a Jewish prophet" (Thénien). The priests whom Josiah caused to be put to death (ver. 20) were not levitical or Israelitish priests at all, but, unquestionably, idol-priests who had established themselves in the country. וְהָיָה cannot be understood as if Josiah offered these priests as a sacrifice to God. If that were so he would have helped to establish the human sacrifices which it was the object of his reformation to root out. וְהָיָה here has the sense of to slaughter, as often elsewhere (see Ezek. on 1 Kings xix. 21). They suffered upon their own altars the death-penalty imposed by the Law (Deut. xvii. 2–5). At the same time these altars were thereby defiled and made unfit for use. According to Tertullian public child-sacrifices lasted in Africa usque ad proconsulatum Tiberii, qui eosdem sacerdotes in isdem arboribus templi votivis crucibus exponit.

Ver. 21. And the king commanded all the people. Josiah had abolished with relentless severity all which was forbidden in the book of the covenant and the Law to which he had bound the people by an oath of allegiance (ver. 3); now, however, he proceeded to perform all which was there commanded, and he began, as Hezekiah had done (2 Chron. xxx. 1), by ordaining a passover, for this feast had been instituted to commemorate the exodus and the selection of Israel to be the peculiar people, which was the foundation of its national destiny, and of its calling in human history. No other feast could have served so well to inaugurate the restored order as this one, which had been celebrated even in Egypt. The statement: וְהָיָה in the book of this covenant does not mean: which is mentioned in this book. That would be a superfluous remark, and the translation would not be a correct rendering of the original. It means that the Passover was to be observed according to the regulations prescribed in the book which had been found. The translation of Luther [E. V. also] following the Sept. and Vulg. is not correct: "Am Buch dieses Bundes" [in the book of this covenant], for that would require וְהָיָה. The emphasis falls on "book." Josiah does not wish that the passover shall be celebrated according to precedent and tradition, but according to the regulations of the book which had been read before the people. This is the only conception of its meaning according to which we get a good sense, for the remark in ver. 22: surely there was not holden such a passover, &c. וְהָיָה refers to what immediately precedes: "In this book of the covenant," so that the sense is: No passover had been so strictly observed according to the regulations of the Law since the times of the judges. Even the Passover of King Hezekiah had not been perfectly conformed to the law, for he was compelled by circumstances to deviate in some respects (2 Chron. xxx. 2, 17 sq.). Clericus: Crediderim hoc velle scriptorem sacrum: per tempora regum nunquam ab omnibus secundum omnes leges Moaiscas tam accurate Pascha celebratum fuisse. Consuetudinem antea, etiam sub piis regibus, videntur secuti potius quam ipsa verba legis; quod cum fit, multa necessario mutantur ac negliguntur. Sed inventi nuper libri verba attendi diligentissime voluit Josias. It is difficult to understand how any one could understand from this passage, as De Wette does, that no Passover had ever been celebrated before this one. Thenius also asserts that "it can hardly be doubted that the celebration of the Passover was neglected from the time of the Judges on, and that it did not begin again until after the ordinances of the Law in regard to it had once more become known under Josiah," because "there is no reference whatever to the Passover either under Samuel, or David, or Solomon." He therefore infers that "in order to bring about an accord with the story in Chronicles of the Passover feast instituted by Hezekiah" הָחֵדָּה was substituted for הָחֵדָּה in ver. 21, and בְּפֶסַח for בְּפֶסַח in ver. 22. In this way, of course, anything may be found in the text which any one wants to read there. Neither the day of Atonement nor the Feast of Pentecost is expressly mentioned in the historical books, and the Feast of Tabernacles is only mentioned in connection with the consecration of the temple (1 Kings viii. 2). It would therefore follow that the Israelites alone of all ancient peoples had no religious festivals from the time of the Judges. If, however, one festival was celebrated it was certainly the feast of the Passover, which was moreover a natural festival (Levit. xxi. 10 sq.; Deut. xvi. 9). The same chronicler who recorded the Passover under Hezekiah also gives a detailed account of the one under Josiah, and adds at the close of his account (xxv. 18) the same comment which we here find in ver. 22. We cannot, therefore, assume that ver. 22 has suffered any alterations "in order to bring it into accord with the record of the Passover under Hezekiah." On ver. 23 see the Præf. Rem.

Ver. 24. Moreover the necromancers.—"After Josiah had completed the reformation of the public worship, he went on to put an end to all the superstitious practices and idol-worship which were carried on in private houses" (Thenius). The necromancers and wizards had arisen under Manasseh (chap. xxi. 6). The Teraphim, or household-images, were the penates, the gods of the fireside, to which a magical power was ascribed. They served as a kind of talisman for the family, and as a kind of private oracle. Cf. Gen. xxxi. 19; Judges xviii. 14; Ezek. xxi. 26; Zach.

x. 2. On עֲלֵי see 1 Kings xv. 12 and 2 Kings xvii. 12. They were doubtless private household gods. And all the abominations that were spied, i. e., everything which was to be abhorred and which was found anywhere, "for it might well be that many things of this character were concealed" (Thenius). That he might establish, i. e., put in operation. Even private and family religious observances were to be regulated according to the newly discovered book, in order that it might serve as the norm and rule for the entire life of the people. The author therefore proceeds (ver. 25): And like unto him, &c., by which he means, according to the context, that the entire law of Moses was not so strictly and severely carried out by any king before Josiah, not even by Hezekiah, although the latter was not at all inferior in genuine piety and in trust in the Lord (see notes on chap. xviii. 5). With all his heart, &c., has distinct reference to Deut. vi. 5.—In vers. 26 and 27 "the author passes on to the story not only of the end of Josiah, but also of the fall of the kingdom" (Keil). עָלָה in ver. 26 stands in contrast with עָלָה in ver. 25. Josiah turned to Jehovah, but Jehovah turned not from his wrath. Quamvis enim rex religiosissimus esset populusque metu et pareret, propterea tamen animus populi non erat mutatus, ut satis liquet a castigationibus Jeremia, Sophonia, et aliorum prophetarum, qui circa hæc tempora et paulo post vaticinati sunt (Clericus). Cf. Jerem. i. 10; Zeph. i. 2-6; iii. 1-4. The corruption had struck such deep root during the reign of Manasseh that it could not be eradicated even by Josiah's severe measures. The Law was observed externally, but the conversion of the entire people was out of the question. This became distinctly apparent after Josiah's death. Hence the long-threatened judgments of Jehovah must now fall. On ver. 27 see Jer. xxv. 26, and notes on chap. xxi. 4-7.

Ver. 28. Now the rest of the acts of Josiah, &c. The author now hastens to the close of the history of Josiah. It is necessary to tell how he met his end, but he does this very briefly (ver. 29). The more specific details are given by the chronicler (II. xxxv. 20-27). Necho (in Chronicles and in Jerem. xli. 2: נֶכֶח; in the Sept. and Josephus Νεχάω) was, according to Herodotus (ii. 158), who calls him Νεκῶς, the son of Psammetich I. According to Manetho he was the sixth king of the twenty-sixth, Saitic, dynasty, and was an energetic prince who built fleets both on the Mediterranean and on the Red sea. The King of Assyria, against whom Necho was marching, can hardly have been Sardanapalus, under whom Nineveh was destroyed by the Babylonians and Medes, but the Babylonian Nabopolassar, the father of Nebuchadnezzar, who, as ruler of Assyria also, might now be called king of that country. For Necho lost the battle of Carchemish (2 Chron. xxxv. 20) to Nebuchadnezzar (Jerem. xli. 2), and Josephus says (Antiq. x. 5, 1) that Necho undertook this expedition against Μήδους καὶ Βαβυλωνίων, ἐπὶ τὴν Ἀσσυρίαν κατέλυσαν ἀρχὴν, τῆς γὰρ Ἀσίας βασιλεύσαι πόθον εἶχεν. Evidently Necho desired, now that the Assyrian empire had come to an end, to hinder the Medes and Babylonians from forming a world-monarchy, and to become himself ruler of Assyria (see Winer, R.-W.-B. I. s. 105 sq. II. s. 143. Duncker, Gesch. des Alterthums I. s. 499 sq.). He did not take the long and tedious way through the desert of Tih and southern Palestine, but made use of his fleet, and landed probably in the neighborhood of the Phœnician city of Akko, in a bay of the Mediterranean. This is evident from the fact that Josiah did not march southwards to meet him, but northwards, and that they met at Megiddo, in the plain of Jezreel, at the foot of Mount Carmel. On the situation of this city see Exeg. on 1 Kings iv. 12 and ix. 15. Herodotus calls it Μάγδαλον, and Ewald understands him to refer to Megdel, south-east of Akko; but, as Keil shows in his comment on the verse, this can hardly be correct. He slew him. This curt statement finds its explanation in 2 Chron. xxxv. 22-24, according to which it was not Necho himself that slew Josiah, but the latter was mortally wounded by an arrow from the Egyptian bowmen, and then died at Hadad-Rimmon (Zach. xii. 11), not far from Megiddo.—The people of the land (see chap. xxi. 24) made the younger son of Josiah king, as we see by comparing ver. 31 with ver. 36, perhaps because they had greater hopes of him, though in this they were mistaken (Jerem. xxii. 10 sq.). It is stated that they anointed him (a ceremony which is not elsewhere expressly mentioned in speaking of a change upon the throne), perhaps because he was not the son whom Josiah had chosen to succeed him (see notes on 1 Kings i. 5 and 34), but nevertheless they desired to give him the consecration of a legitimate king.

[On the contemporaneous history see the Supplementary Historical Note after the next Exegetical section.]

HISTORICAL AND ETHICAL

1. King Josiah was the last true theocratic king of Judah. Higher praise is given to him than to any other king, even to Hezekiah, namely, that he "turned to the Lord with all his heart, and with all his soul, and with all his might, according to all the Law of Moses." Sirach, in his panegyric on the fathers, groups him, as we have said above, with David and Hezekiah, besides whom there was no king who did not more or less abandon the Law of the Lord. He also further says of him what he says of no other king: Μνημόσυνον Ἰωσίου εἰς συνθέσιν θυμιάματος, ἐκκενασμένον ἐργῷ μυστηρίου, ἐν παντὶ στόματι ὡς μέλι γλυκανθήσεται, καὶ ὡς μουσικὰ ἐν συμποσίου οἶνον (Sir. xlix. 1). Josephus also (Antiq. x. 4, 1) is loud in his praise. If we take into consideration, on the one hand, that under his two immediate predecessors, Manasseh and Amon, who together reigned for sixty years, apostasy and corruption had spread far more widely, and penetrated far more deeply, than under Ahaz, who only reigned sixteen years, and, on the other hand, that Josiah, at the time of his accession, was only a boy of eight years, who might be easily influenced and led astray, then it appears to be almost a miracle that he became what he was. This miracle is not by any means explained by supposing that, after the death of Amon, "the priests of Jehovah once more gained influence at court" (Duncker), or that "the priests of Jehovah succeeded in getting the young prince, whom the opposite party had elevated to the throne, under their control" (Menzel). We have not the slightest hint that Josiah was educated or controlled by any priest of Jehovah, as was the case with Joash under entirely different circumstances (chap. xii. 2). Neither did the prophet Jeremiah have influence upon his education, for that prophet made his first appearance, while he was yet a young man, in Josiah's thirteenth year, at Anathoth, from whence he was driven away; moreover he was not the son of the high-priest, but of another Hilkiah (Jerem. i. 1, 6). Ewald's comment is far better (Gesch. III. s. 696): "We cannot reach an accurate notion of the educational development through which he passed during his minority, but the decision and strictness with which he defended and maintained the more austere religion, in the eighteenth year of his reign and the twenty-sixth of his life, show plainly enough that he had early attained to a firm determination in favor of true nobility and manliness of life. It may well be that the grand old history of Israel, with its fundamental truths, as well as the memory of David's greatness, of the marvelous deliverance of Jerusalem from Sennacherib, and of all else which was glorious in the history of his ancestors, had early made a deep impression upon him." True as this is, however, it is not sufficient to account for such a phenomenon as Josiah was, since he stands before us almost like a Deus ex machina. His character is, as Hengstenberg says (Christol. III. s. 496), "as little to be comprehended on the basis of mere natural causes as is the existence of Melchisedek . . . in the midst of the Canaanites, who were hastening on with steady tread and ceaseless march towards the consummation of their sins. The causes which produced Josiah, such as he was, are the same which produced Jeremiah." If it was marvelous that a man like Hezekiah followed a man like Ahoaz, it was still more marvelous that an eight-year old boy like Josiah followed men like Manasseh and Amon, and that he, during all his reign, should have turned "neither to the right hand nor to the left" and should have been unexampled in the entire history of the kings. It was no accident that a king like Josiah arose once more, and attained to the height of David as the model of a genuine theocratic king. It was a gracious gift from the God who had chosen Israel as His own peculiar people, for the accomplishment of His redemptive plan, and Who continued to raise up men who were endowed with gifts and strength to work in and for His plans, and to manifest themselves to His people as His instruments. If a king like Josiah could not restore the people to its calling, then the monarchy, as an institution, had failed of its object and was near its end. The kingdom must hasten to its downfall and the threatened judgments must come.

2. We are made acquainted, in this passage, only with those events in the reign of Josiah (thirty-one years) which appertained to the abolition of idolatry, and the restoration of the legitimate Jehovah-worship. It was by virtue of these events that his reign formed an epoch in the history of the kingdom. In comparison with these events, all else, in the judgment of this historian, sank into insignificance. We see, however, from a passage in the book of Jeremiah, that he was remarkable also in other respects, for the prophet presents him to his son, Jehoiaquim, as a model: "Shalt thou reign because thou closest thyself in cedar? Did not thy father eat and drink, and do judgment and justice, and then it was well with him?" &c. (Jerem. xxii. 13-17). Josephus says of him (L c.): Τὴν δὲ φέρον αὐτὸς ἀριστος ὑπῆρχε, καὶ πρὸς ἀρετὴν εὐ γεγονὸς . . . ὡς ἂν πρεσβυτάτος καὶ νοῦσι τὸ δέον ἱκανάτατος . . . σοφία καὶ ἐπινοία τῆς φύσεως χρέμενος . . . τοῖς γὰρ νόμοις κατακολουθῶν, οὕτω περὶ τὴν τάξιν τῆς πολιτείας καὶ τῆς περὶ τὸ θεῖον εἰσσεβείας εὐδοεῖν τε συνέβαινε . . . ἀπέδειξε δὲ τινὰς κριτὰς καὶ ἐπισκόπους, ὡς ἂν διοικεῖν τὰ παρ' ἐκάστου πράγματα, περὶ πάντων δὲ δίκαιον ποιούμενοι, κ. τ. λ. The fact that he extended his reforming work into Samaria shows that he had attained to power and authority there: when and how he obtained this is nowhere stated, but the fact that he had it stands firm, and might be inferred even from other historical hints. After Esarhaddon, the successor of

Senacherib, the Assyrian power began to sink. The Scythians invaded the country from the North; on the East and South it was threatened by the Medes and Babylonians, who sought to make themselves independent of its power. These events belong to the time of the reign of Josiah. Josiah must have made vigorous opposition to the Scythians who were pressing forward in Palestine towards Egypt, devastating everything, for he remained undisturbed by them. It is very probable that it was easy for him, after their departure, to extend his authority over the territory of the former kingdom of the ten tribes, since the Assyrians were not, at that time, in a position to pay much attention to Israel, or to maintain intact their supremacy over it. In the year 625 the Assyrian power was being hard pushed by Nabopolassar, the father of Nebuchadnezzar, and Josiah's reformation falls in the year 623, that is, in the time when the Assyrian empire was tottering and falling. Whether Josiah, as "a king who desired in all things to be a genuine successor of David," had the intention of "restoring the authority of the house of David over all the surrounding peoples" (Ewald), or whether he "regarded himself, after the fall of the northern kingdom, as king of the entire covenant people, and took advantage of the impending or already accomplished dissolution of the Assyrian empire, in order to conciliate to himself the Israelites who remained in Samaria, to make them well disposed towards his authority, and to win them to his reforms" (Keil), we cannot decide, but this is certainly far more probable than that he "as a vassal of the Assyrian king had a certain limited authority over this territory," and that "his enterprise was permitted by the Assyrian authorities" (Hess), or that he petitioned the new ruler of Assyria (Nabopolassar) for permission to exercise authority there in matters of religion (Thenius). However this may be, Josiah certainly stands before us as a king who was endowed with the above-mentioned virtues of a ruler, and with an enterprising spirit and warlike courage. These last traits are proved by his attempt to resist Necho, in regard to which see below. It is utterly erroneous, therefore, to see in this king, as modern historians are disposed to do, merely a passive instrument in the hands of the priesthood. [See the Supplementary Notes after the Ezra sections on chaps. xx. and xxi., and on the next following section of the text.]

3. The discovery of the book of the Law was, in spite of its apparent insignificance, an event of the first importance for all the subsequent history of Israel. Although Josiah had, before that event, turned to the Lord and sought to inaugurate a reform (see the Prelim. Rem.), yet it was this discovery which determined him to take measures of the utmost severity against all idolatry, and to restore the worship of Jehovah in Judah and in Israel. From this discovery dates the complete revolution in the circumstances of the kingdom, and from this time on this book had such authority that, in spite of all vicissitudes, and in spite of renewed apostasy, yet it held its place in the respect of the nation, it has been recognized until to-day by the Jews as their most sacred religious document, and their religion, in all its distinctive peculiarities, is built upon it. Suppose that this book had never been discovered, but had been lost for ever, so that only incomplete and inauthentic private copies had been preserved, scattered here and there, what would then have been the state of Judaism, and how different must have been the shape which its religious and moral development would have taken. The whole history of Israel bears witness to the guiding and controlling hand of God, but if there is any one event in which, more than in any other, the Providence of God is visible, then it is this important discovery. It was a physical proof that God watches over this document, which is the testimonial to Israel of its election, and the highest divine revelation; that he preserves it from the rage of idolaters; and that, even if it lies long unnoticed and unknown in the night of apostasy, he will bring it again to light, and make it to show its force once more, so that it is like a fire which consumes all which is false and corrupt, and like a hammer which breaks the rocks (Jerem. xxiii. 29). The discovery of the book was a pledge to the king and people of the indestructibility of the divine written word.—Modern historical science has taken an entirely different view of this event. "The impression left by the devastations of the Scythians," says Duncker (Gesch. d. Alt. L. s. 503 sq.), "who had left the land a desert, was deep and fresh in the minds of the people. The king was young, and, as it seems, open to influence. The priests were bound to take advantage of these circumstances to set up a stronger barrier against the Syrian forms of worship. Manasseh's persecutions had led the Jehovah-priests to look about for means to prevent the recurrence of similar oppression. They naturally found themselves forced to an attempt to secure their creed and their official position against the changing will of the kings, to emancipate it from the fickle disposition of the people, and to put an end, at last, to the vacillation between Jehovah-cultus and foreign and heathen forms of worship." There was room to hope that "by means of a law-book, which made the worship of Jehovah the basis of all national life, and embraced all social interests in its scope, all future perils to the priesthood might be prevented, their position might be permanently assured, and the Jehovah-worship might be securely established and strictly carried out. . . . A codification of the rules which had been gradually formed by the priests as the scheme of life which would be pleasing to Jehovah, a compendium which should sharply emphasize the chief demands which religion made upon the laity, was, therefore, needed. For such a law-book alone was there hope that it would find acceptance, that it would be recognized by the king and by the people as an unquestionable authority, and as the organic law of the country, and that it might be completely and successfully put in operation. This was the purpose, and these were the fundamental principles on which this book (Deuteronomy), which Hilkiah, the high-priest, sent to the king, was compiled. . . . Josiah was deeply moved by the contents of it, and by the threats which it pronounced against those who transgressed the Law of Jehovah. In order to convince himself of the genuineness of this book as the real law of Moses, he appealed from the authority of the temple and the high-priest to a female soothsayer. The wife of one of the king's officers, Huldah, was asked in regard to the genuineness of the book, and she declared that the words of the book were the words of Jehovah."

We have an example, in this entire presentation of the incident, of the inexcusable manner in which modern historical science treats the biblical history. The book which was found was, according to this view, simply the book of Deuteronomy, an assumption which, as we have seen, is so contrary to the text that even the most daring and advanced critical science has recognized its falsehood. This book, too, is represented as having been secretly compiled after the Scythian invasion of Palestine, that is, as we have seen above, after 627 B. C., by the priests, without the knowledge of the king, and then as having been sent to the latter by Hilkiah, as the book written by Moses, and now rediscovered, so that it would be in fact forged. The king permits himself to be deceived, and is deeply moved by the threats invented by the priests, yet he turns, superstitiously, to a "female soothsayer," inquires of her in regard to the genuineness of the book, and she, being of course initiated into the secret of the priests, answers that the words of the priests are the words of Jehovah. The whole affair is thus reduced to cunning, deceit, and falsehood, on the part of the priests, in their own selfish interests. The priests, with the high-priest at the head, are vulgar cheats, and the king and people are cheated. The entire grand reformation, and the complete revolution in the state of the kingdom, with all the religious development which followed, rest upon a forgery. Such an arbitrary and utterly perverse conception refutes itself, and Ewald (l. c. s. 700) justly says: "We must beware of obscuring the view of the incident by any such incorrect hypothesis as that the high-priest composed this book himself, but denied its origin. Want of conscientiousness in the conception of history cannot be more plainly evinced than by such unfounded and unjust suppositions." Ewald himself, on the other hand, ascribes the composition of Deuteronomy to a prophet who, during the persecution by Manasseh, took refuge in Egypt, and says: "If the book was written thirty or forty years before, by a prophet who, at this time, was dead, and if it found circulation only gradually, so that it finally reached Palestine as it were by accident, a copy might accidentally have found its way into the temple, and there have been found by the high-priest." But the notion that the book of Deuteronomy was composed in Egypt "stands in the air," and has thus far been adopted by none but Eisenlohr. Moreover, that it came to Palestine by accident, came into the temple by accident, by the hand of an unknown priest, and without the knowledge of the high-priest, so that it was found by him, again—"by accident," not only does not explain the incident, but it even makes it still more marvelous and inexplicable than it is according to the biblical account. If we assume that the book of Deuteronomy was first written in the time of Manasseh, or in the time of Josiah, and that the book of the Law thereby first reached its completion, then we are compelled to have recourse to all sorts of arbitrary hypotheses to account for the alleged "discovery" of the book at this time.

[It seems hardly probable that the question of the date and authorship of the book of Deuteronomy will ever be definitely settled. On the one hand, the traditional view is firmly fixed in the belief of the Church. On it are supposed to hang doctrinal inferences which would fall if the Mosaic authorship were surrendered, and these doctrines are regarded as too essential to the structure of the Christian faith to admit of any weakening. Such a position is false philosophically, as it involves a reasoning from dogma to fact, instead of the contrary and only legitimate process. Nevertheless, there seems little reason to expect that this position will be overthrown, at least as far as we can yet foresee. Moreover, the admission that Moses was not the author involves, or seems to involve, the admission of a literary forgery, although no one can believe that Moses wrote the account of his own death in the 34th chapter. On the other hand, the grounds for believing in the comparatively late origin of this book are such as only scholars of great attainments can appreciate or understand. Therefore the position of the question now is, and probably for a long time to come will be, that the opinion which enjoys ecclesiastical sanction is the traditional opinion of the Mosaic authorship, while the scholars (with very few exceptions, and those of inferior authority) are firmly convinced that Deuteronomy was written at a time long after that of Moses, and by an unknown hand. The grounds on which the latter opinion is based are critical and historical. The former are, in the briefest statement, these: (a) The language of the book. It is marked by archaisms such as are peculiar to the other books of the Pentateuch, but these are found side by side with peculiarities of the late language, especially those which mark the book of Jeremiah. It is said that this is a clear proof that the author lived in the later days of the Jewish monarchy, and either unconsciously adopted ancient forms from familiar acquaintance with the old Scriptures, or purposely affected archaic forms. (b) Its literary style. It bears the character of a codification or digest of the previous books. It is also marked by a handling of the ordinances of Moses, in the spirit of their principles, but with the freedom of one who had thoroughly studied them, and digested them, and now purposed to codify and arrange them in a more practical and available form. (c) It presents, however, certain variations from the other books of the Pentateuch, always in the sense of making the ordinances more flexible and of freer application, as it were to a higher civilization and a more complicated society. (d) It contemplates a state of things in which the nation is living a settled and ordered life, under a king, face to face with neighbors, not like the Canaanites, but powerful and large enough, if victorious, to swallow up Israel in captivity. (e) It is too long to be delivered as a speech, as it is represented.—The historical arguments are these: (a) Deuteronomy ordains worship at one central sanctuary, a thing which was not regarded as important until after the time of Solomon, but which, from the time of Josiah on, became a fixed and fundamental doctrine of the Hebrew religion. (b) The spirit of the book of Deuteronomy is that which marked Josiah's reformation and the preaching of the later prophets. It controlled the ultimate development of the Jewish religion after the captivity.—All these arguments meet with answers from the opposite school, the weight of which depends on the philosophical or dogmatic prepossessions of the persons who are called upon to weigh them. They are only mentioned here to show in general and in brief what is the character of the grounds on which "critical science" has based the belief that Deuteronomy was not written by or in the time of Moses. They are independent and critical throughout. To estimate them requires close knowledge of the Hebrew language and history, a knowledge which goes beyond grammar and dictionary, and involves philosophical insight, and critical sagacity and skill. Certainly it devolves upon all who are charged with the study of the Scriptures to give to the subject a candid and unprejudiced consideration, in order that the truth, on whichever side it may lie, may be established. There is not a subject on which the tyro in biblical learning may more easily fall into rash error, nor one upon which those who cannot, or will not, enter upon the tedious investigation which is involved ought more carefully to refrain from passing a dogmatical judgment.

Strictly speaking, this question lies aside from our present occupation. In commenting on the 23d chapter of the 2d book of Kings, and noticing the bearing of the facts which it records upon the "development of the plan of redemption" (see Preface), we have only to notice the effect produced by the discovery of the "book of the Law." But it is asserted by some that this book was not the same, nor a mere copy of any, which had existed before, but a revision of the former records, with an addition consisting of a repetition and codification of the ancient ordinances. They assert that this new work was an extension and re-application of the legislation of Moses, which was especially adapted to the time of Josiah, and that herein lie the grounds of its great and peculiar influence. If such an assertion be true, and if the peculiar character of this new revision, as compared with the ancient records, was a new and broader apprehension of the spirit of the Mosaic legislation, and if this new spirit gave to that legislation a new impetus which made it the controlling principle in the subsequent development of the Jewish religion, then certainly it was a most important event in the development of the history of redemption. In fact, if this assertion be true, the composition of the book of Deuteronomy was the most important incident in the history of the Israelites after the time of Moses. Hence the importance of studying the question involved in the most thorough manner, by its proper evidence, with all the light which history or criticism can throw upon it.

Our present chapter bears upon it in so far as we discern in the reformation of Josiah a peculiar character, as compared, for instance, with that of Joash, or that of Hezekiah, and in so far as these peculiar features of this reformation are traceable to Deuteronomy as distinguished from the other books of the Pentateuch. On this point we observe that this book of the Law produced a profound sensation. It brought to the king's notice things which he had never heard or known of, and which, therefore, were not popularly known of, as parts of the "Law of the Lord," although something was certainly known under that name. It is also said that the thing in the new book which especially attracted his attention, and stirred him to the action which he took, was the "threats" or denunciations which it contained (cf. Deut. xxviii. especially vers. 25 and 64). But these only occur in the book of Deuteronomy. When we read the description of future and possible degeneracy under the kingdom, and the threats of captivity, &c., which are contained in the book of Deuteronomy, and compare them with the state of things under Josiah, when the northern kingdom had already disappeared in Assyrian exile, we cannot wonder at the effect produced on the king's mind. He saw himself and his nation in this description as in a mirror.—We also notice particular expressions: "Turned neither to the right hand nor to the left," as the description of a perfect king (cf. Deut. v. 32; xvii. 11, 20; xxviii. 14); the "burning" of idolatrous images and utensils (ver 4. cf. Deut. vii. 25; xii. 3); "With all his heart" (xxiii. 25. cf. Deut. vi. 5); the death penalty for idolatry (xxiii. 20. cf. Deut. xvii. 2-5). The fact that, from this time on, the "Law" played a far more important part in forming and guiding the faith and practice of the Jews than ever before is indisputable. The author describes its influence above. Whether we can discern in the further developments the peculiar effect of the book of Deuteronomy, so far as that book differs in character from the other books of the Old Testament, or not, is a question which must be left to the study of the passages and books from which it may appear.—W. G. S.]

4. The prophetess Huldah, who is mentioned only here, offers a very remarkable proof that prophecy, "as a free gift of the divine spirit, was not confined to a particular sex," and that "God imparts the gifts of his spirit, without respect to human divisions and classifications, to whomsoever He will, according to the free determination of His holy love. The people were to recognize the truth, although, it might be, in imperfect measure; that the time would come when there would be a general pouring out of the spirit upon it, Joel iii. 1 sq." (Havernick on Ezek. xiii. 17.) Besides Huldah there are two women mentioned in the Old Testament who are designated as prophetesses, Miriam (Ex. xv. 20), and Deborah (Judges iv. 4). But she was a נְבִיאָה in another and fuller sense than they.

What they did and said was produced in a state of ecstasy; they did not prophesy in the narrower and stricter sense of the word, i. e., they were not instruments by means of which God made known His will and purpose to those who asked it. She solemnly and expressly pronounces her oracle as the word of Jehovah (chap. xxii. 16, 18: "Thus saith the Lord"), and she uses the manner and form of speech of the true and great prophets. The same or similar fact is not true of any other woman. She stands alone in the history of the old covenant, and it is very significant that just at this point, where the entire future of the people and its grandest and highest interests are at stake, the Lord makes use of a weak and humble instrument to bring about the execution of His purpose. Huldah cannot, therefore, be at all brought into comparison with the witch of Endor (1 Sam. xxviii. 7), or with the prophetesses of whom Ezek. speaks (chap. xiii. 17). The wife of Isaiah is also called נְבִיאָה (Isai. viii. 3), but in an altogether different sense, viz., as wife of the prophet and mother of the prophet-sons. Finally Noadiah is designated (Nehem. vi. 14) as a false prophetess. The rabbis arbitrarily fix the number of prophetesses in the Old Testament at seven (Seder Olam 21). Their statements in regard to Huldah, as, for instance, that an honor was shown her after her death which was not shown to anybody else not of the house of David, namely, to be buried inside of the walls of Jerusalem, belong purely to tradition, it is true, but they show in what high esteem she stood (cf.

Witsius, De Prophetissis in the Miscell. Sacr. I. p. 288).

5. The abolition of idolatry and of the illegitimate Jehovah-worship under Josiah is distinguished from every earlier attempt of the kind, even from that under Hezekiah, by the fact that it was far more thorough. It extended not only to the kingdom of Judah but also to the former kingdom of Israel, not only to the public but also to the private life of the people. The evil was everywhere to be torn out, roots and all. Nothing which could perpetuate the memory of heathen, or of illegitimate Jehovah-worship remained standing. All the places of worship, all the images, all the utensils, were not only destroyed but also defiled; even the ashes were thrown into the river at an unclean place that they might be borne away forever. The idol-priests themselves were slain, and the bones of those who were already dead were taken out of the graves and burned. The priests of Jehovah who had performed their functions upon the heights were deposed from their office and dignity, and were not allowed to sacrifice any more at the altar of Jehovah. This reformation has been charged with "violence," and this has been offered as the explanation of the fact that it was so short-lived. So Ewald: "This attempt at reformation bears the character of violence in all its details of which we have any knowledge. . . . The evil results of such violent conduct in religious and civil affairs soon showed themselves, and all falling together in an accumulated evil produced a discord and confusion which could not be smoothed over," &c. To this Niemeyer (Charakt. d. Bib. V. s. 100) answers: "In the case of such corruption which had already eaten into the vitals of the State, and, above all, in the face of such unnatural customs as were connected with it, let any one say what he will about the compulsion of conscience and the harshness of compelling a man to adopt a religion which he does not choose, I believe that it was a political right and duty to eradicate the evil, if indeed it was any longer possible to eradicate it. I will not say that the mass of men generally goes whither it is led, and that there is no instruction or improvement possible for them but that which is based upon authority and belief, so that better leaders and a more reasonable authority are a gain at all times. I will only reply to those who charge Josiah with cruelty and tyranny, in putting the priests of Baal to death, that those who should preach murder as a religious duty, and as an exercise pleasing to God, would not be left unpunished in any enlightened State. Josiah, therefore, when he put an end to these abominable sacrifices of innocence, for vengeance for which mankind seemed to stretch forth its hands to him, did no more than the kindest ruler would have considered it his duty to do." Hess also well remarks (Gesch. d. Könige, II. ss. 236 and 238): "To allow them [the priests of Baal] to live would be to nourish seducers for the people, and to transgress the law to which a new oath of allegiance had just been taken, for this demanded that those who introduced idolatry should be exterminated. . . . Josiah's fundamental principle was that a half-way eradication of idolatry would be no better than no attempt at all. If anything of this kind had been permitted to remain, the door would have been left open for the evil sooner or later to return. The idolatrous disposition and tendency took advantage of the slightest circumstance, and seized upon the slightest trace of former idolatry, to once more gain a footing." We should like to know how Josiah should have undertaken to get rid of the harlots and male prostitutes who had settled themselves in the very forefront of the sanctuary, and there carried on their shameful occupations, or to abolish the horrible and abominable rites of Moloch, with their child-sacrifices and licentiousness. That would never have been possible in the way of kindness, as we see from the attempts of the prophets. When was a reformation ever accomplished, when corruption had reached such a depth, without "violence"? Even Luther, who publicly burned the popish law-books, cannot be acquitted of it; and how would the reformation of the 16th century have come to pass if no violence had been used against the corruptions which had affected not only religious, but also moral and social order, and if those corruptions had been treated only by kind and mild means? Nothing is more mistaken than to criticise and estimate antiquity from the standpoint of modern humanity and religious freedom. Even the Lord Jesus Christ did not pronounce a discourse to those who had made the house of God a den of thieves (Matt. xxi. 13); he made a whip and scourged them out of the temple (John ii. 15). That also was "violence." It is nowhere hinted that Josiah forced the people to accept the Jehovah-religion against their conviction. He only put an end by violence to the heathen usages and licentious abuses, and this he did not do until after he had collected the people, made them acquainted with the Law-book, and received their assent to it. The Israelitish monarchy was not instituted to introduce religious liberty; on the contrary, it was its first and highest duty to sustain the fundamental law of Israel (Deut. xvii. 18, 19; 1 Kings ii. 3). To use the physical force which it possessed in the service of this law was its right and its duty.

[Let us endeavor to analyze the circumstances, and the principles which are here at stake, and to arrive at a sharper and firmer definition of our position in regard to them. What deserves distinctly and permanently to be borne in mind is this: if mild measures would not have availed to accomplish the desired object of rooting out idolatry and restoring the Mosaic constitution, neither did these violent measures have that effect. Josiah's reformatory efforts failed of any permanent effect, and his arrangements disappeared almost without a trace. It is very remarkable that the prophets, who might have been expected to rejoice in this undertaking, and to date from it as an epoch and a standing example of what a king of Judah ought to do, scarcely refer to it, if at all. A few pages back we had occasion to use strong terms in condemnation of a violent and bloody attempt of Manasseh to crush out the Jehovah religion and establish the worship of other gods. Violence for violence, can we approve of the means employed in the one case any more than in the other? Is the most highly cultured Christian conscience so uncertain of its own principles that it is incapable of any better verdict than this: violence when employed by the party with which we sympathize is right; when employed against that party it is wrong? We justify Josiah and we condemn the Christian persecutors and inquisitors. Are these views inconsistent, and, if not, how can we reconcile them? We have to bear in mind that it is one thing to admit excuses for a line of conduct, and another to justify it. Judaism certainly had intolerance as one of its fundamental principles. Violence in the support of the Jehovah-religion was a duty of a Jewish king. In attempting to account for and understand the conduct of Josiah, it would be as senseless to expect him to see and practise toleration as to expect him to use fire-arms against Necho. We can never carry back modern principles into ancient times and judge men by the standards of to-day. To do so argues an utter want of historical sense. On the other hand, however, when we have to judge actions which may be regarded as examples for our own conduct, we must judge them inflexibly by the highest standards of right and justice and wisdom with which we are acquainted. How else can we deny that it is right to persecute heresy by violent means when that is justified by the example of Josiah? Judged by the best standards, Josiah's reformation was unwise in its method. The king was convinced, and he carried out the reformation by his royal authority. The nation was not converted and therefore did not heartily concur in the movement. It only submitted to what was imposed. Hence this reformation passed without fruit, as it was without root in public conviction. We are sure of our modern principles of toleration, and of suffering persecution rather than inflicting it. We believe in these principles even as means of propagating our opinions. Let us be true to those principles, and not be led into disloyalty to them by our anxiety to apologize for a man who is here mentioned with praise and honor. Violence is the curse of all revolutions, political or religious. Has not our generation seen enough of them to be convinced of this at last? Do we not look on during political convulsions with anxiety to see whether the cause with which we sympathize will succeed in keeping clear of this curse? Is it not the highest praise which we can impart to a revolution, and our strongest reason to trust in the permanence of its results, that it was "peaceful"? The Protestant Reformation was indeed violent, but it was weak just in so far as it was violent, and the bitter fruits of the violence which attended it follow us yet in the bitter partisan hatred which marks the divisions of the Church of Christ. The most successful reformation the world has ever seen was the one our Lord brought about—how?—by falling the victim of violence, and by putting the means of force and authority utterly away from himself. Josiah's reformation is not an example for us. Its failure is a warning. We have not to justify the method of it. We cannot condemn the man, for his intentions and motives were the best, but we cannot approve of or imitate the method of action. Its failure warns us that no reformation can be genuine which is imposed by authority, or which rests on anything but a converted heart, and that all the plausible justifications of violence which may be invented are delusions. See further the bracketed notes in the next section.—W. G. S.]

6. Josiah's measures aimed at a thorough reformation of the kingdom. This king, who sought the Lord in his early youth, turned neither to the right hand nor to the left, and had devoted himself to the Lord with all his heart and all his might (chap. xxii. 2; xxiii. 25; 2 Chron. xxxiv. 2 and 3), did not aim merely at the extirpation of idolatry and the external observance of all the proscriptions of the Mosaic Law, but at the conversion of his entire people to the Lord, and at the renewal of their religious as well as of their moral and political life (see the passage from Josephus under § 2). In spite of all the energy and severity with which he sought to accomplish this, he nevertheless failed. He succeeded in suppressing all public forms of idolatry, and in maintaining the Jehovah-worship in its integrity as long as he lived, but a real and sincere conversion was no longer to be hoped for. The nation had, since the time of Manasseh, advanced so far in the path of corruption that a halt was no longer possible. Apostasy from the living God had gained too strong a hold in all classes, among the rich and great, and even among the priests. It had contaminated all and had corrupted all the relations of life. Judah was in a worse state than any which even Israel had ever been in. The Jehovah-worship which had been reintroduced became a mere external ceremonial worship, and finally degenerated into hypocrisy and pretended righteousness. This is clear from the writings of the contemporary prophets, Jeremiah and Zephaniah (Jerem. iii. 6 sq.; Zeph. iii. 1 sq.). "The State seemed to arise once more, but it was only like the last flicker of an expiring fire. The internal corruption was so great that the new and good religious order seemed to be only produced by a kind of enchantment. All the props and supports on which it rested broke in pieces when the king, whose early death seemed like an inexplicable dispensation of Providence, closed his eyes" (Vaihinger in Herzog's Real-Encyc. VII. s. 36). Only the severest chastisements of Providence could avail here, and they were not long in falling. Ewald presents the matter somewhat differently (l. c., s. 700 sq.), and, as usual, Eiselenhorr follows him. He finds the grounds of the failure of Josiah's reformation not so much in the irreformability of the people as in the character of the reform itself. In the first place he says that it was "the spirit of violence which had from the beginning characterized the Jewish nation and which was now reawakened, which necessarily impaired his [Josiah's] work," inasmuch as "it might do away for a time with the evils, but could not permanently stop up their sources. . . . The true religion could only impair its own good effect and progress, if it clung, at this late and changed time, to the narrowness which marked its youth. Since such violence had been used in rooting out all which was heathenish, the reconstruction of all which was peculiar in the Jehovah religion must be carried out in the same spirit. The first new Passover served as a sign of the severity with which the regulations of the Jehovah-worship were hereafter to be observed." Then again "a new series of evils" was developed from the circumstance that "a book, especially such an imperfect Law-book and history as the Pentateuch, was made the fundamental law of the nation; first of all, that evil which naturally arises where a sacred document is made the basis of all public and social life, viz., a puffed-up book-wisdom, and a hypocritical and false learning in the Scriptures." Finally, instead of reconciling the parties which had existed ever since the time of Solomon, he thinks that Josiah's violent reformation intensified the party divisions and sharpened the party lines. "The party which may be called the deuteronomical, or stricter, party demanded unsparing severity in rooting out heathenism; . . . the heathen, or more liberal, party, on the other hand, . . . not only allowed the worship of heathen gods, but also took pleasure in the low standard of morality which attended idolatry. While, therefore, the strict party demanded a policy which, in fact, was no longer adapted to the circumstances of the country, and sought to carry it out by force, the liberal party fell short of the standard of morality which the times required. But though the latter no less than the former relied upon physical force, it nevertheless had the entire tendency of the time towards a wider and freer development in its favor. It therefore gained the upper hand immediately after Josiah's unfortunate death, . . . so that the whole kingdom fell into a complete confusion which nothing but greater force than either party had at its disposal could put a stop to." Eisenlohr also, speaking from a similar point of view (Das Volk Israel II. s. 354 sq.), says: "The entire reformation degenerates into a slavish restoration, a seeking out again and dragging forth of all the old institutions and ordinances of the kingdom . . . if possible, in a still more stiff and immobile form, so that . . . they produced the strongest reaction under the existing imperfect organization of the religious life. . . . The State-religion exerted its utmost powers to effect a renewal of the national vigor, and a preservation of the national identity, by setting the theocratic law and constitution in operation in its fullest, and most rigid, and most peculiar, construction," but "hardly had the State-religion begun, under royal protection, to forcibly control anew the public life, before a cry of sharp complaint began to arise against the evils which are the inseparable concomitants of every privileged form of religion,—hypocrisy, and external or pretended piety." To this must be added that "a sacred codex became the standard of all public life. . . . The effects of the entire method in which the reformation exerted its influence on the national life, and sought to accomplish its ends, were, for the moment, all the more disastrous (!) inasmuch as its internal principle was violence and its external policy was bigoted exclusiveness." It needs no proof to show that this entire manner of conceiving of the circumstances stands in the most pronounced antagonism to the biblical representation. The Scriptures contain no hint of all these reasons why Josiah's reformation failed, and even became finally disastrous, so that it brought about the downfall of the kingdom. Neither the historical books nor the discourses of the contemporary prophets contain a word of disapproval of the reformation; they offer only one reason for the failure of it, and that is the total corruption and perversity which had grown up since the time of Manasseh (chap. xxii. 16 to 20; xxiii. 26, 27; Jerem. xv. 1-4.

[No reason at all is specifically assigned anywhere why this reformation failed. Its failure is not spoken of, recognized, or accounted for. Manasseh's sins are referred to as the explanation of the judgments which fell upon Judah. But when we speak of the national "corruption" which had been spreading since the time of Manasseh as the ground of the failure of Josiah's reformation, it is allowable to go farther and ask: In what did this corruption consist? What were the especial forms of vice which were prevalent in Judah? What were the tendencies which the reformation had to encounter? What were the faults of national character which were in play? What were the selfish interests which the reformation threatened? These all make up what we call in a word national corruption and decay. It is only by such analysis that we are able to present to our minds the state of things in detail and to comprehend the situation. "Corruption" is only a general word which serves to cover the state of things, to conceal it from us, and to keep us from penetrating to a satisfactory conception of it. It is not difficult to gather from the documents, historical and prophetic, answers to the above questions. When we examine the subject we find that Ewald's picture of the parties and their characteristics, of the tendencies in play, &c., is exceedingly faithful. It would certainly be wrong if any one should say that the "violence" of Josiah's reformation caused the subsequent decay and downfall of Judah. Also the effect of using a document as ultimate authority is exaggerated by Eisenlohr, if not by Ewald. The pedantry of the rabbis, and the ritual righteousness of the Pharisees, did not arise for centuries. But this much is certainly true: The corruption had advanced so far that perhaps all hope of converting the nation by moral and religious appeals was vain. Even, however, if such were the case, a violent reformation, imposed on royal authority, could do no good, but only additional harm. It did not stem the tide of corruption, while it embittered parties and left deep-rooted hatred and thirst for revenge.—Stanley gives tables of the parties which existed in Jerusalem, at this time, in his Lectures on the Jewish Church, II. 565 and 566.—W. G. S.]

In the view above quoted [Ewald's and Eisenlohr's] it is really Josiah who, on account of his mistaken zeal and unwise measures, was to blame for the ruin of the kingdom, but the text says of him that there was no king like him before him, who so completely clung to the Lord with all his heart (chap. xxiii. 25), and thereby presents him as the one who, among all the kings after David, was just what a king of Israel ought to be. But the charge is entirely incomprehensible that he did not allow to the "liberal party" "the worship of all gods" together with their "baser standard of morality," and that "a sacred book became the standard of all public life." Not to speak of anything else, it is exactly for this reason that he received the promise that he should not himself live to see the desolation, but should be gathered to his fathers in peace (chap. xxii. 19, 20). [Josiah is not charged with any fault in not having done this. It is said that the measures which he took did not tend to correct or convert these misguided men, but only to compel them to submit to force, and that thus their opinions were not altered, while their feelings were embittered. As soon as they dared, they returned, with renewed zeal, to the practice of their opinions, and also sought revenge for the oppressive persecution which they (as they thought) had suffered.—W. G. S.] The charge against Josiah of having made a sacred book the standard involves an insult to the fundamental Protestant doctrine of the authority of the Bible as the sole standard of religion and morality, and, therefore, also of civil life. We see here whither we are led when we allow ourselves to be guided, in the interpretation of the Old Testament, by the doctrines of modern liberalism.

[The idea here presented of the danger which attends the use of a written document as the standard of religious truth and of morality is not a liberalistic doctrine. It is a truth which deserves solemn attention, most of all from Protestants. Those who believe in the authority of the Bible, and teach it and use it continually, are the very ones who need to have always distinctly in mind the dangers which inhere in the use of a literary standard, in order that they may guard against them. In the use of any such standard the interpretation of it becomes a matter of transcendent importance. Witness the rabbis, and the scribes and lawyers of Gospel times, that the danger of a class of men growing up who will hold knowledge of the Scriptures to be their privilege, who will develop an artificial and radically false and vicious system of interpretation, and who will overburden the Word with fancies and fables and arbitrary inventions, is no imaginary one. Witness the scholastics of the middle ages that the text of Scripture may be made a stem on which to hang frivolities and casuistical toys without end. Witness the papacy that the interpretation may come to be regarded as a matter so all-important that the Scriptures, except as interpreted, may be reserved as an exclusive possession of a privileged class. The danger of hypocritical book-wisdom and esoteric exegetical knowledge is one to be guarded against continually.]

With regard to the general estimate of Josiah's reformation we may sum up as follows: The attempt, on the part of the king, to arrest the dissolution and corruption of the nation by bringing it back to sincere devotion to the national religion is worthy of our most hearty admiration. The source of his early inclination towards the Jehovah-religion we cannot trace. It is clear that a violent persecution like that of Manasseh must have produced terror, bitterness, stubborn though concealed opposition, and a relentless purpose, on the part of those who had all the law and traditions of their nation, together with patriotism, on their side, and who could compare with pride the moral purity of their religion with those abominations of heathenism which were shocking and abhorrent to the simplest instincts of human nature, to repay their persecutors at the first opportunity. Where those abominations were the only religious observances taught, education might avail to make them pass without protest; but where there was any, even a slight knowledge of a purer religion and a better morality, the protest could never entirely die out. The Jehovah-religion was, as compared with heathen religions, austere. It warred against the base passions of men and the vices which they produce. Heathenism seized upon those passions as its means. It fostered them in the name of developing what was "natural," and therefore must be right. Modern civilized heathenism does just the same thing. Heathenism therefore seemed to represent enjoyment of life, while the Jehovah-religion seemed to repress pleasure. It is remarkable that a boy-king should have chosen the latter. We are ignorant of the persons or considerations which may have influenced his choice. There is an undeniable resemblance in features between the revolutions of Hezekiah, Manasseh, and Josiah, which seems to point to a relationship between them. A chain of reprisals seems to have been started, and each successive revolution or reformation was more radical, more bloody, and more unsparing than the last. The newly discovered book, with its commands and threats, gave the king a stimulus to undo all that Manasseh had done, to put a stop to the abominations which the latter had firmly established, to reintroduce the ancient national cultus in its perfection, to requite the heathen party for its cruelty, to avenge the slaughtered servants of Jehovah, to foster those religious observances and moral principles which might regenerate the State, and to establish the new order of things securely. The thought of vengeance he may not have had, but it would be most natural, and not by any means shocking to the mind of a man of his generation. His purpose then was perfectly laudable and good. The means which he adopted for carrying it out were the only ones which could suggest themselves to him. They were the same in kind as Hezekiah had adopted, and as Manasseh had employed on behalf of the contrary interest, only he went still farther. No Jewish king would ever have thought of employing other means. It is idle to sit in judgment on him. His example in this, however, cannot form any rule for an age which enjoys a higher enlightenment, and a truer wisdom. As for the evil effects of the "violence" employed by Josiah, they may be limited to the embittering of those party divisions which seem to have hastened this fall of Jerusalem as they did the one under Titus. The great reason for his failure, however, was that the means which he employed encountered too strong opposition in the popular feelings and tendencies of the nation at the time. He was working up hill, so to speak, in trying to bring back the nation to a more severe religion, a sterner morality, and a purer patriotism. They preferred their luxury, and pleasure, and vice. He had only a small party with him, and the reformation which was accomplished by royal authority controlling the physical force of the realm, which was conducted in the interest of a written code which could not have been thoroughly understood and appreciated, and which did not have the hearty co-operation of the body of the people, failed when the king fell upon whose will it mainly depended. The death of Josiah was a disappointment and discouragement to the Jehovah party far beyond the mere loss of their protector and friend. They no doubt had no little superstitious confidence in the favor of heaven for the pious prince, and this was struck to the ground when the life on which all the prosperity of the Jehovah-worship seemed to depend was taken away, as it were by a stroke of Providence.—W. G. S.]

7. Josiah's expedition against Necho, which brought about his early death, fell in the year 609 B. C., fifteen years after he accomplished his reformation in Judah and in the former territory of Israel. He must, therefore, have gained possession of the latter, or, at least, must have regarded himself as ruler of it. Necho, therefore, had no right to pass through this territory without paying any respect to Josiah's authority, even though, as he asserted (2 Chron. xxxv. 21), he had no hostile intention towards the king of Judah. Josiah, therefore, undertook to intercept him, as Josephus says (Antiq. x. 5, 1): μετὰ δυνάμεις ἐπὶ αὐτὸν διὰ τῆς ἰδίας ποιῆσαι χώρας τὴν ἐπὶ τοῖς Μήδοις ἔλασιν, and, in spite of Necho's assurance that he meant him no harm, Josiah persisted in refusing to allow him

τὴν οἰκίαν δι᾽ ἡγεσθαι. The ground for this conduct of Josiah was not, as many have assumed, that he had already formed an alliance with Nabopolassar, the Babylonian, the new ruler of Assyria, or that he desired to secure the favor of this conqueror in the hope that he would thus make sure of being left in undisturbed possession of his kingdom, but the grounds of his conduct were very simple and close at hand. "A very little reflection sufficed to see that it was all over with the independent existence of the kingdom of Judah if the Egyptians secured a foothold in the country to the North" (Ewald). [Judah would thus be placed between Egypt and its outlying conquests, and of course its independence would not be long respected.] Niebuhr justly characterizes Josiah's undertaking (Gesch. Assy. s. 364) as a "thoroughly correct policy . . . Josiah knew that, although Necho asserted that he had no hostile intention towards him, yet, if the Egyptians conquered Coelo-Syria, the independence of Judah was at an end." As a true theocratic king, and as a man of warlike courage and disposition (the Sept. translate the words 2 Chron. xxxv. 22 by πολεμεῖν αὐτὸν ἐκκρατῶν), he did not allow himself to be deceived by Necho. By the dispensation of Providence he fell at the very beginning of the campaign (Josephus: τῆς πετρῶννης, οἶμαι, εἰς τοῦτ' αὐτὸν παρορμησάσης). His death was a great misfortune for the nation, but it was nevertheless honorable. It was universally lamented, especially by Jeremiah (2 Chron. xxxv. 24 and 25). All felt what they had lost in him. The more detailed account in Chronicles gave occasion to some of the older historians to blame Josiah severely. For instance, Hess (Gesch. der Könige Jud. und Isr. II. s. 455 sq.): "He was so over-hasty as to dispute the passage through the country with Necho, and collected an army at Megiddo. . . . This was not at all necessary for the security of his own kingdom, for Necho had advanced so far without doing him any harm, and had sent an embassy expressly to assure him that he intended him no harm, but was directing his attack against the mighty monarchy to the East, being stimulated thereto by a divine calling. . . . To thus attack the Egyptian without the counsel of a prophet, or any sign of divine direction, was not trust in God, but in his own power. . . . It was, in any case, unwise to offend a ruler who was mighty enough to measure forces with the Babylonian power." It is incorrectly assumed in this view that the "God," whose approval Necho claimed, was Jehovah, the God of Israel. It is nowhere asserted that Josiah made this expedition without having consulted "the true oracle of Jehovah," that is, without the "counsel of a prophet." To judge from what Jeremiah says about Egypt in his forty-sixth chapter, he would hardly have dissuaded the king from this undertaking. We see how far it was from the intention of the chronicler, in his fuller account, to hint at anything unfavorable to Josiah, for he is the very one who makes especial mention of the universal grief for the death of Josiah, of the songs of lamentation which the singers sang for him "until this day," and of the lament which Jeremiah wrote. We cannot conceive that all this would have been so if he had entered rashly into the war, contrary to the advice of the prophet, and had thus plunged the nation into misfortune. Von Gerlach very mistakenly infers from the account in Chronicles that "Josiah, in spite of his sincere piety, belonged to the number of weak and inefficient and imprudent rulers who closed the long series of kings of the house of David." In that case how could Jesus Sirach, who certainly was not ignorant of what is there narrated, say of him, centuries later (xlix. 1), that the memory of him was like costly incense, and sweet as honey in the mouth of all. [On the historical connections of this event see the Supplem. Note at the end of the next Exeget. section, below.]

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Vers. 1 and 2. The panegyric of Josiah, Sir. xlix. 1 and 2. His name is like costly incense and sweet as honey; for as he walked, &c. Although his father walked in evil ways, yet Josiah did not take him as an example, but that one of his ancestors who was a man after God's own heart. He sought the Lord while he was yet a boy, and increased in knowledge and in favor as he grew in stature (2 Chron. xxxiv. 3; Luke ii. 40, 52). "Wherewithal shall a young man cleanse his way, &c.," Ps. cxix. 9. STARKE: Beginners in the Christian life must choose good examples and follow them faithfully (Phil. iii. 17; 1 John ii. 14). He turned not either to the right hand (like the later Pharisees), nor to the left (like the Sadducees); although he lived in a corrupt age, he fell neither into superstition nor unbelief. The way which leads to life is narrow, and it is well to have a firm heart so as not to totter on either side.—WÜRT. SUMM.: We are seduced on the right by hypocrisy, and on the left by epicureanism, but the word of God says: This is the way, walk therein, and turn neither to the right hand nor to the left (Isai. xxx. 21).—CRAMER: We have in Josiah the mirror of a true ruler. (1) Such an one is given by God, out of pure grace, as a blessing to the country. (2) Such an one is bound, not only to protect the life and property of his subjects, and to preserve peace and order, but also to care for the Church and Kingdom of God.—WÜRT. SUMM.: We ought not to despair of the children of the godless and to give them up; they may become, as in this case Josiah did, the most pious, through whom God accomplishes wonders. Good instruction and discipline may, by the blessing of God, correct much evil which such children have inherited or learned from their parents.

Vers. 3–10. The Discovery of the Law-Book. (a) The occasion of it, vers. 3–7. (b) The significance of it, vers. 8–10.—Vers. 3–7. The Restoration of the House of God. (a) The king undertakes it impelled by pure love to the Lord (Pa. xxvi. 8). (b) The people of all the provinces willingly contribute to it (2 Chron. xxxiv. 9). (c) The laborers work without reckoning, with fidelity.—See the homiletical hints on chap. xii. 5–17.—Josiah was zealously interested in the repair of the temple before the law-book was found and he had become acquainted with it. We have not only the old law-book but also the entire word of God; each one may hear and read it, nevertheless the churches are often allowed to fall into decay, and it is only at the last moment that any one thinks of spending money and time upon them.—BERL. BIBEL: All are here earnestly interested in the work upon the house of God. Would that our zeal might be aroused for the same interests! that we might not rest where we should work, nor work where we should rest; not to tear down where we ought to build, nor to build where we ought to tear down, but to carry on the work of the Lord orderly and properly.—CRAMER: The physical temples are useless, if the spiritual temples are not properly cared for.—Vers. 8-10. What is the use of building and arranging and adorning churches, if the word of God is wanting in them, and instead of being a light to shine, and bread to feed, is hid under a bushel or locked up, and concealed by the ordinances of men and their own self-invented wisdom?—PAFF. BIB.: Wretched times when the law-book has to be concealed; happy times when it is rediscovered. How happy are we who have the word of God in such abundance! WÜRT. SUMM.: As in the times of Josiah the law-book had been pushed aside and become lost by the carelessness of the priests, so that scarcely any one knew anything about the law of God, so, before the time of Luther, under the papacy, the Holy Bible lay, as it were, in the dust, and, although it was not entirely lost, yet there were very many, not only among the common people, but also among the ecclesiastics and men of rank, who had never seen and read the Bible, until God called Luther and others, through whose faithful services the Bible, the holy and divine Scripture, was once more brought forth, brought into the light, and given to every man, in all languages, to read for himself; which goodness of God we still recognize and praise, and read, on account of it, more diligently in the Bible, and exercise ourselves in the word of God day and night, that we may obey the words of the Apostle Paul (Col. iii. 16): "Let the words of Christ dwell in you richly in all wisdom."—There is indeed nowadays scarcely a family, in countries where evangelical religion is professed, in which a Bible is not to be found, but it is often laid aside, and covered with dust, or it is regarded as an old book which is no longer adapted to our times. What higher praise, however, could be given to a family than to say: I found therein the Word of God, not hid under a bushel, but set on a candlestick, so that it gave light to the whole house (Matt. v. 15).—Vers. 9 and 10. Nothing which is undertaken with zeal and faith to glorify the name of God ever remains unblessed. Shaphan brought to his master the greatest and best treasure possible out of the temple which was falling to ruin.—The Book of books is there to be read by every one, king or beggar. The minister was not ashamed to read it before the king, and the king was not ashamed to listen with the utmost attention.

Vers. 11-14. The Impression which the Divine Word made on the King when he had heard it. (a) He rent his garments (sorrow and grief on account of the transgressions of the people, horror in view of the divine judgments. PAFF. BIB.: How profitable it is to have such respect for the word of God and to be terrified at His threats! If the word of God had such effect upon us, how much better it would be for us). (b) He asks how the threatened judgments may be averted. (Wherever the word penetrates to the heart, there the question always follows: What shall I do? Acts ii. 37. Felix trembled, but he said: "When I have a more convenient season," &c., Acts xxiv. 25).—WÜRT. SUMM.: When we hear of God's threats against sin, let us not allow them to pass as idle winds, but take them to heart and seek the means of grace. We must only ask of the Apostles and Prophets who wrote as they were impelled by the Holy Ghost. God speaks with us through their words. His answer is: Repent, believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and forsake sin.—Ver. 14. See Hist. and Eth. § 4.—STARKE: True fear of God is humble and honors the gifts of God wherever it finds them, but in itself least of all.—Vers. 15-20. The Oracle of the Prophetess a Threat for the people (vers. 15-17), and a Promise for the King (vers. 18-20).—The Lord will bring temporal misfortune upon the city which despises and scorns His law; what will He do to that which rejects His Gospel? 2 Tim. i. 8, 9.—Those who humble themselves at the word of the law will come to the grave in peace. The just are taken away before the calamity comes (Isai. lvii. 1). If the Lord takes thee early away from the earth, submit to His will and say: Lord, let now thy servant depart in peace, as Thou hast said (Luke ii. 29).

Chap. xxiii. 1-25. Josiah's Great Work of Reformation. (a) He renews the covenant on the basis of the newly discovered law-book, vers. 1-3. (b) He puts an end pitilessly to all idolatrous worship in the kingdom, vers. 4-20. (c) He restores the legitimate worship with the celebration of the Passover, vers. 21-25.—Every true reformation must proceed from the word of God, and have that as its basis; then it is strong, not only in destroying and denying, but also in building up and restoring (Luther and the reformers).—Vers. 1-3. The king collects the entire people and lays the law-book before them; not until after they have approved does he begin the work. The civil and spiritual authorities ought not to proceed violently and in self-will in matters of the highest importance for Church and State, nor to force the consciences of the people. They ought to secure the assent of the latter. The entire people, small and great, learned and unlearned, ought to be made acquainted with the word of God, so that no one can plead ignorance as an excuse. To deny to the people the right to read the Word of God is not to reform, but to destroy. KYBURZ: Josiah caused the light which he had received to shine to all; so do ye also. We ought not to enjoy any treasure which we discover without sharing it with others.—The people joined in the covenant outwardly but not heartily, therefore it had no permanence. How often now a whole congregation promises obedience to God and does not keep it. Do not expect hearty conversion everywhere where you hear assent to the word of God (Matt. vii. 21; Isai. xxix. 13).

Vers. 4-20. WÜRT. SUMM.: Here we may see that when God's word is laid aside people fall into all kinds of vice. So it was under the papacy. If we observe the word of God we shall be saved from sin and error.—Although the civil authorities ought to apply no force to conscience, yet they ought to punish murder and licentiousness, no matter what may be the pretence under which they are committed. The more severely and more pitilessly they do this, the more honor they deserve.—Weeds grow most rapidly; they can only be destroyed by being pulled up by the roots.—The abominations which took root in Israel were a proof of what St. Paul says, Rom. i. 21-28. In times of corruption, and against inveterate evils, mild measures are of no avail, but only the utmost severity, which has no respect of persons. Ecclesiastics who, instead of being pastors of the people, become their seducers, are doubly worthy of punishment, and ought to be removed without mercy.—Vers. 16, 17. STARKE: Divine prophecies will certainly be fulfilled at last, though the fulfilment may be delayed so long that it seems as if it would never follow (1 Kings xiii. 2, 31).—Ver. 18. THE SAME: The bones of departed saints ought to be left in their graves and not to be carried about or displayed.—Vers. 21–24. The building up of a new life must follow upon the eradication of sin. The Passover cannot be celebrated until all the old heaven is removed. The Passover was the feast with which each new year began; we also have a passover or Easter lamb (1 Cor. v. 7, 8).—The festivals and fasts are the frame-work of the common life of the congregation; where they are neglected this life is decaying. If Israel had kept up the celebration of its appointed feasts, it would never have fallen so low.—Vers. 25–27. Why did the Lord not return from His anger? Not because Josiah's efforts were not pure and sincere (on the contrary, they proceeded from pure zeal, and perfect love, and the best intention), but because the people were not converted with their king. They only assented externally and in form; in their hearts they were obstinate and perverse (Jerem. xxv. 3–7).—ROOS: Jeremiah seems to have fallen on a good time with his warnings and exhortations to repentance, but the contents of his books show that such was not the case. This should be a warning to those who look to the authorities for the chief power to convert men, and do not wish to act without them.—LUTHER: Before God inflicts a severe judgment he always grants a great illumination. Therefore a great judgment will fall upon those who now neglect the Gospel.—Vers. 29 and 30. See 2 Chron. xxxv. The early death of the king was no punishment for him, for he was thus gathered in peace to his fathers, but it was a chastisement for his unrepentant people, who now lamented him and saw, when it was too late, what noble purposes he had had in their behalf.

THIRD SECTION.

THE MONARCHY FROM THE REIGN OF JEHOAHAZ TO THAT OF ZEDEKIAH.

(CHAPS. XXIII. 31—XXV. 30.)

A.—The Reigns of Jehohaz, Jehoiakim, Jehoiachin, and Zedekiah.

CHAP. XXIII. 31—XXV. 7.

- 31 Jehohaz was twenty and three years old when he began to reign; and he reigned three months in Jerusalem. And his mother's name was Hamutal, the 32 daughter of Jeremiah of Libnah. And he did that which was evil in the sight
 33 of the Lord, according [like] to all that his fathers had done. And Pharaoh-nechoh put him in bands [took him captive] at Riblah in the land of Hamath, that he might not reign¹ in Jerusalem; and put the land to [laid upon the land]
 34 a tribute of a hundred talents of silver, and a talent of gold. And Pharaoh-nechoh made Eliakim the son of Josiah king in the room of Josiah his father, and turned his name to Jehoiakim, and took Jehohaz away: and he came to 35 Egypt, and died there. And Jehoiakim gave the silver and the gold to Pharaoh; but he taxed the land to give the money according to the commandment of Pharaoh: he exacted the silver and the gold of the people of the land, of every [each] one according to his taxation [assessment], to give it unto Pharaoh-nechoh.
 36 Jehoiakim was twenty and five years old when he began to reign; and he reigned eleven years in Jerusalem. And his mother's name was Zebudah, the 37 daughter of Pedaiah of Rumah. And he did that which was evil in the sight of CHAP. xxiv. 1. the Lord, according to all that his fathers had done. In his days Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon came up, and Jehoiakim became his servant
 2 three years: then he turned and rebelled against him. And the Lord sent against him bands of the Chaldees, and bands of the Syrians, and bands of the Moabites, and bands of the children of Ammon, and sent them against Judah to destroy [devastate] it, according to the word of the Lord, which he spake by his servants the prophets. Surely [Only] at the commandment of the Lord came this upon Judah, to remove them out of his sight, for the sins of Manasseh, according to [in] all that he did; And also for the innocent blood that he shed: for he filled Jerusalem with innocent blood; which the Lord would not pardon. Now the rest of the acts of Jehoiakim, and all that he did, are they not written in the book of the Chronicles of the kings of Judah? So Jehoiakim slept with his fathers: and Jehoiachin his son reigned in his stead. And the king of Egypt came not again any more out of his land: for the king of Babylon had taken from the river of Egypt unto the river Euphrates all that pertained to the king of Egypt.

Jehoiachin was eighteen years old when he began to reign, and he reigned in Jerusalem three months. And his mother's name was Nehushta, the daughter of Elnathan of Jerusalem. And he did that which was evil in the sight of the Lord, according [like] to all that his father had done. At that time the servants of Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon came^a up against Jerusalem, and the city was besieged. And Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon came against the city, and his servants did besiege it. And Jehoiachin the king of Judah went out to the king of Babylon, he, and his mother, and his servants, and his princes, and his officers: and the king of Babylon took him in the eighth year of his [the king of Babylon's] reign. And he carried out thence all the treasures of the house of the Lord, and the treasures of the king's house, and out in pieces all the vessels of gold which Solomon king of Israel had made in the temple of the Lord, as the Lord had said. And he carried away [captive] all Jerusalem, and all the princes, and all the mighty men of valor, even ten thousand captives, and all the craftsmen and smiths: none remained, save the poorest sort of the people of the land. And he carried away Jehoiachin to Babylon, and the king's mother, and the king's wives, and his officers, and the mighty of the land, those carried he into captivity from Jerusalem to Babylon. And all the men of might, even seven thousand, and craftsmen and smiths a thousand, all that were strong and apt for war, even them the king of Babylon brought captive to Babylon. And the king of Babylon made Mattaniah his father's brother king in his stead, and changed his name to Zedekiah.

Zedekiah was twenty and one years old when he began to reign, and he reigned eleven years in Jerusalem. And his mother's name was Hamutal, the daughter of Jeremiah of Libnah. And he did that which was evil in the sight of the Lord, according [like] to all that Jehoiakim had done. For through the anger of the Lord it came to pass in Jerusalem and Judah, until he had cast them out from his presence [...] that [omit that; insert And] Zedekiah rebelled

CHAP. XXV. 1. against the king of Babylon. And it came to pass in the ninth year of his reign, in the tenth month, in the tenth day of the month, that Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon came, he, and all his host, against Jerusalem, and pitched against it; and they built forts [siege-works] against it round about. And the city was besieged unto the eleventh year of king Zedekiah. And on the ninth day of the fourth [omit fourth]^a month the famine prevailed in the city, and there was no bread for the people of the land. And the city was broken up [a breach was made in the city], and all the men of war fled by night by the way of the gate between two walls, which is by the king's garden (now the Chaldees were against the city round about [had invested the city]:) and the king^a went the way toward the plain. And the army of the Chaldees pursued after the king, and overtook him in the plains of Jericho: and all his army were scattered from him. So they took the king, and brought him up to the king of Babylon to Riblah; and they gave judgment upon him. And they slew the sons of Zedekiah before his eyes, and [he] put out the eyes of Zedekiah, and [they] bound him with fetters of brass, and carried him to Babylon.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 88. On the keri see remarks under Exegetical.

² Chap. xxiv. ver. 8. כִּכְלִיָּהּ here has peculiar force. It means in or throughout all that he did, infecting all according to a certain measure. Whatever he did there was a certain measure of wickedness in it according to its character. The somewhat subtle force of the particle led to variants. "One codex has כִּכְלִיָּהּ, Sept. and Syr. וְכִכְלִיָּהּ. The reading in the text is correct" (Thenius).—W. G. 8.]

³ Ver. 10. The keri is to be preferred.—Bähr. [The chetib is sing. The keri is a grammatical correction. The sing. may have been written with the mind fixed on Nebuchadnezzar. This point has importance for the question whether he accompanied the expedition from the outset. Cf. ver. 11.]

⁴ Chap. xxv. ver. 8. [The statement that it was the fourth month is here imported into the text by the translators from Jeremiah, who gives it in both places; chap. iii. and chap. xxxix.]

⁵ Ver. 4. [כִּנְיָ is singular, and our version supplies "the king" as the subject. It is more likely that it is a case of the indefinite subject "one" (Fr. on; Germ. man). The army went, or, as we are obliged to translate, they went. The king's presence in the train is implied and assumed. In Jerem. iii. 7 we find כִּנְיָ, and in Jerem. xxxix. 4, the sing. כִּנְיָ, but there the king is mentioned in the context.—W. G. 8.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 31. Jehoahaz was twenty and three years old. This son of Josiah is called by Jeremiah (xxii. 11) Shallum (שָׁלֻם), which name, according to Hengstenberg, Keil, and Schlier, is significant, and means: "He who shall be recompensed," referring to his fate (vers. 33 and 34). But why should this king be expressly so named when others, as, for instance, Jehoiaquin and Zedekiah, met with a similar fate (chaps. xiv. 15; xxv. 7)? According to Junius, Hitzig, and Thenius, Jeremiah gave him the name Shallum, with reference to his reign of three months (chap. xv. 13), in the same manner as Jezebel named Jehu "Zimri, murderer of his master" (chap. ix. 31). But this also is forced and invented. In 1 Chron. iii. 15, in the enumeration of the sons of Josiah, he is called Shallum instead of Jehoahaz, but we may be certain that the chronicler did not put in a "symbolical" name, which the prophet only once used with particular significance and emphasis, by the side of three other actual names, and in a dry genealogical list. Shallum was the name which this king actually bore before his accession to the throne. When he became king he received another name, just as Eliakim and Mattaniah did (ver. 34 and xxiv. 17). Shallum took the name Jehoahaz, i. e., He-whom-Jehovah-sustains. The people made him king in place of his elder brother, and Shallum seemed a name of evil omen, inasmuch as the former king Shallum [of Israel] only reigned for one month. According to Josephus, Jehoahaz reigned three months "and ten days."

Ver. 33. And Pharaoh-necho took him captive at Riblah in the land of Hamath. וַיִּקְחֵהוּ נֶחֱוֹ is generally translated: he bound him, or put him in bonds, but נֶחֱוֹ has also "the primary meaning, to make captive, without the notion of fettering, Gen. xlii. 16" (Gesenius), and, taking into consideration chap. xvii. 4, this more general signification is here to be preferred.—The city of Riblah (now the village Riblah) belonged to the district of the Syrian city Hamath at the foot of Mt. Hermon (Antilebanon), on the river Orontes, that is, therefore, on the northernmost boundary of Palestine towards Damascus (1 Kings viii. 65; 2 Kings xiv. 25; Amos vi. 14). Riblah lay in a large and fruitful plain on the high-way which led, by way of the Euphrates, from Palestine to Babylon. At a later time Nebuchadnezzar also established his headquarters there (chap. xxv. 6, 20, 21. See Winer, R.-W.-B. II. s. 323). It can hardly be the same Riblah which is mentioned in Numb. xxxiv. 11 (see Keil on that passage). If Necho had already advanced, since the battle of Megiddo in which Josiah fell (ver. 29), on his way to the Euphrates, as far as Riblah, it cannot be that, during the three months that Jehoahaz reigned, he had also made a detour to Jerusalem and besieged and taken that city. Shalmaneser spent three years in besieging and taking Samaria, which was not so strongly fortified (chap. xvii. 5). Moreover, Necho did not probably "quit the main army without great necessity while it was advancing against a powerful enemy" (Winer). The text says distinctly that he took Jehoahaz prisoner in Riblah and not in Jerusalem, and it gives no support to Keil's statement, that, while the main army advanced slowly towards Riblah, "he sent a detachment to Jerusalem to take that city and dethrone the king." In that case he must have captured the king in Jerusalem and not in Riblah. The attempt has been made to sustain this notion that Necho took Jerusalem by a statement of Herodotus (II. 159): μετὰ τὴν μάχην (at Megiddo) Κάδουσις πόλιν τῆς Συρίας εἰσέεισε μεγίστην ἐπέε. But it is now universally admitted that Κάδουσις cannot mean Jerusalem, but rather that it was some sea-port (cf. Herod. III. 5), although this does not necessarily imply that it was Gaza, as Hitzig and Starke affirm. [It is Kadesh, a city of Syria, on the Orontes, near to Emessa, the ruins of which have lately been discovered.—Lenormant.] We are not told how Jehoahaz came to Riblah, but it certainly was not, as the old expositors supposed, with a large army in the intention of repeating his father's attempt to arrest Necho's advance, for the army of Judah had perished in the battle of Megiddo. According to Josephus, who says nothing of any capture of Jerusalem by Necho, the latter summoned Jehoahaz to come to his camp (μεταπέμψεν πρὸς αὐτὸν), and took him captive when he came. This is more probable than that he came of his own accord, "perhaps to seek from the victor the ratification of his election to the throne" (Thenius). However that may be, he was unexpectedly made a captive at Riblah. We may infer, as Ewald does, from Ezek. xix. 4, where he is likened to a young lion whom "the nations" had taken "in their pit" (certainly not, therefore, at Jerusalem), that he was "treacherously" bound and carried away captive to Egypt. [See the Supplem. Note below, at the end of this section.]—The words בְּיָמָיו are translated by Keil: "When he had become king in Jerusalem." That, however, had been said just before in ver. 31, and is understood from the connection as a matter of course, so that it would be a mere idle remark. Neither can the translation: "Because he had exalted himself to be king in Jerusalem" (Deroser), or, dum regnaret (Vatablus) be sustained. We must, therefore, adopt the keri בְּיָמָיו, as is done by the Chaldee version, the Sept. (τοῦ μὴ βασιλεῖν ἐν Ἱερουσαλὴμ), and the Vulg. (ne regnaret in Jerusalem). This is further confirmed by the parallel passage (2 Chron. xxxvi. 3) in which the verse is abbreviated: "And the king of Egypt put him down (וַיְסִרֵהוּ) [i. e., removed him, set him aside] at Jerusalem." (The Sept. have in that place ἔθρσεν which represents the Hebrew of Kings, and they have here μετίστησεν which represents the Hebrew of Chronicles.) In 3 Esra i. 3 also we find: καὶ ἀπέστησεν αὐτὸν βασιλεῖς Αἰγύπτου τοῦ μὴ βασιλεῖν ἐν Ἱερουσαλὴμ. It is not necessary to suppose, with Ewald, that בְּיָמָיו was "dropped out" from 2 Chron. xxxvi. 3; still less, with Thenius, to read in this place, וַיְסִרֵהוּ instead of וַיֹּאכֶזְרוּ.—

And laid upon the land a tribute. The relative amount of the silver and the gold is remarkable, one hundred talents of silver to one of gold, but, as the same figures are given in 2 Chron. xxxvi. 3 and in 3 Esra i. 36, we are not justified in changing them, as Thenius does, appealing to chap. xviii. 14, and adopting the statement of the Sept. that there were ten talents of gold instead of one. It may be that Necho wanted silver, which was rarer in the Orient, or that he did not wish to alienate the country too much from himself by pitiless severity. The entire tribute amounted, according to Thenius, to 230,000 thaler [$165,600]; according to Keil the gold amounted to 25,000 thaler [$18,000], and the silver to 250,000 thaler [$180,000].

Ver. 34. And Pharach-necho made Eliakim, son of Josiah, king, &c. After the victory at Megiddo and the death of Josiah, Necho regarded himself as master of the country, and therefore he would not recognize as king Jehoahaz, who had been elevated to the throne by the people without his (Necho's) consent. Possibly also, as has often been assumed, either the elder brother Eliakim, who had been passed over, had appealed to Necho, or the Egyptian party had, by its intrigues, induced Necho, after setting aside Jehoahaz, to appoint the elder brother, and not a foreigner, for instance one of his own generals. He changed his name, as was the customary sign of subjection and vassalage (chap. xxiv. 17; Dan. i. 7). It appears that the choice of a name was left to Eliakim, who only changed—יְהוֹאָחָז to—יְהִיָּה in the composition of his former name so that its signification: God (Jehovah) will-establish, remained the same. Whether he did this "in intentional contradiction to the humiliation of the royal dynasty of David, which Jeremiah and the other prophets had threatened" (Keil), is very doubtful. Menzel very mistakenly infers that the name Jehoia-kim pleased Necho better "on account of the connection with the Egyptian moon-God."—And took Jehoahaz away, לָקַח does not mean here: "He had taken prisoner," any more than it does in ver. 30. This much has already been stated in ver. 33. It only means that he did not leave him in Riblah where he had taken him captive, but took him away from there (Gen. ii. 15). The Sept. and the Vulg. read, instead of וַיֹּאכֶזְרוּ; וַיִּבְיָהוּ, et duxit, and in Chronicles we find וַיִּבְיָהוּ, but וַיֹּאכֶזְרוּ implies that Jehoahaz came to Egypt before Necho returned thither.—"In ver. 35 the details in regard to the payment of the tribute imposed by Necho are given before the history of the reign of Jehoia-kim is entered upon, because the payment of that tribute was one of the conditions on which he was elevated to the throne" (Keil). וְשֵׁם = nevertheless, but in order to obtain the sum;

he did not pay it out of his own means. He demanded contributions "from each one, even from the humblest inhabitant" (Ewald). This place shows that by "the people of the land" we have not to understand, as Thenius does, the "national militia," or the "male population fit for war."

Ver. 36. Jehoiakim was twenty and five years old. He was therefore two years older than Jehoahaz (ver. 31), and must have been begotten by Josiah in the fourteenth year of the latter's age. His mother was not the same person as the mother of Jehoahaz. Rumah, her native place, is probably identical with Arumah in the neighborhood of Shechem (Judges ix. 41).—

Chap. xxiv. 1. In his days Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon came up. On the name נְבוּכַדְנֶצַּר (Jeremiah generally, and Ezekiel always, writes it נְבוּכַדְנֶצַּר), its different forms, and its significance, see Gesenius, Thesaurus, II. p. 840; and Niebuhr, Gesch. Assyriens, s. 41. [The name is Nabu-kudurri-uzur, and means either Nebo-protects-the-youth (Oppert), or, Nebo-is-the-protector-of-landmarks (Sir H. Rawlinson)—Rawlinson, Five Great Mon. III. 80.] He was the son of Nabopolassar, and he appears here for the first time in this history. The question as to the time in Jehoia-kim's reign at which he made this expedition can be answered from other data with tolerable certainty. According to Jerem. xxv. 1, the fourth year of Jehoia-kim's reign was the first of Nebuchadnezzar, and according to Jerem. xlv. 2 this fourth year of Jehoia-kim was the year in which Nebuchadnezzar inflicted a decisive defeat upon Necho near Carchemish, a large well-fortified city at the junction of the Chaboras and the Euphrates (Winer, R.-W.-B. I. s. 211 sq.). Moreover, according to Jerem. xxxvi. 1, Jeremiah commissioned Baruch, in this fourth year of Jehoia-kim, to write down his discourses in a book which was read in public on a great fast day which was held in the ninth month, that is, towards the end of the fifth year of Jehoia-kim (ver. 9). This fast-day was not ordained on account of a misfortune which had already been experienced, "in order, by humiliation and submission, to turn aside the wrath of God, and to implore the divine pity" (Keil), but "evidently, because Jehoiakim was alarmed at the approach of the Chaldeans, and saw in it danger of a calamity to the country which might perhaps yet be averted" (Ewald): for Jehoiakim, when he heard that the book had been read, commanded it to be brought, and then cast it into the fire, because there was written in it: "The king of Babylon will certainly come and destroy this land" (ver. 29, cf. also ver. 3). At the time of this fast-day, therefore, Nebuchadnezzar had not yet come. His coming was something to be looked forward to even in the ninth month of the fifth year of Jehoiakim. It follows that his expedition took place, at the very earliest, at the end of the fifth, or at the beginning of the sixth, year of Jehoiakim's reign. How far southward he penetrated, whether as far as Egypt, as some suppose, is uncertain. The supposition that he at this time captured the strongly fortified city of Jerusalem (Keil), and even took captive a part of the inhabitants of the city or country, as he did at a later time under Jehoiachin, is not sustained by anything in the Book of Kings or in Jeremiah. It is inconceivable that he should have done so and yet no mention of it be found in Scripture. This much only is certain: that Jehoiakim then "became subject to him for three years," that is, until the eighth or ninth year of his reign (chap. xxiv. 1), which may well have come to pass without the capture of Jerusalem, or the deportation of its inhabitants, although we do not know the manner in which it did come about. We have, therefore, to present to our minds the course of events as follows: After Necho had defeated Josiah at Megiddo and taken Jehoahaz captive at Riblah, and had made Jehoiakim king, he pushed on northeasterly towards the Euphrates, but he was met and so severely defeated by Nebuchadnezzar at Carchemish that he was obliged to give up his plan of conquering Assyria and retreat to Egypt. The victor, Nebuchadnezzar, then advanced through the territory east of Jordan, where he had little opposition to encounter (Knobel, Prophet. II. s. 227), and made the king of Judah, who had for five years been a vassal of the king of Egypt, subject to himself. After three years, however, Jehoiakim revolted, but for the remaining two or three years of his reign he was hard pressed by bands of Chaldeans, Syrians, Moabites and Ammonites, who were probably incited to invasion by Nebuchadnezzar, for he was too much occupied in other directions, in consequence of the death of his father, to march against Judah in person: When he found opportunity he appeared in person with an army "to punish the revolt, and he took vengeance for it upon the son [Jehoiachin] who had recently succeeded Jehoiakim" (Thenius), especially because Jehoiachin had not, at his accession, immediately submitted to the Babylonian authority.

Against this natural and simple conception of the course of events two biblical texts may be cited. 2 Chron. xxxvi. 6 reads: "Against him came up Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon, and bound him in fetters, to carry him to Babylon. Nebuchadnezzar also carried [some] of the vessels of the house of the Lord to Babylon, and put them in his temple at Babylon." It is not here asserted that Jehoiakim was actually brought as a captive to Babylon, and this can, in fact, hardly have been the fact, for he was king in Jerusalem not eight or nine but eleven years (2 Kings xxiii. 36; 2 Chron. xxxvi. 5). It would be necessary, therefore, to assume that he was set at liberty again and came back to Jerusalem as king, of which we have no hint anywhere, and which is highly improbable. Certainly he did not die in Babylon (chap. xxiv. 6; cf. Jerem. xxii. 17-19). The Sept. filled out the meagre story of Jehoiakim in Chronicles from this account, but omitted entirely the words: "And bound him in fetters," &c., evidently because they considered them incorrect. In view of the remarkable brevity and superficiality with which the chronicler treats the history of Jehoiakim and Jehoiachin, it appears, as Hitzig supposes (note on Dan. i. 2), that he confused the two, for, according to our more detailed and more accurate account, the incidents which he mentions as having occurred to Jehoiakim really happened to Jehoiachin (chap. xxiv. 13-15). Josephus (Antiq. x. 6, 1) seems to have made the same mistake, for he confuses the history of the two kings. He says that Jehoiakim, on the promise that no harm should happen to him, admitted Nebuchadnezzar into the city, but that the Babylonian broke his word and put to death the king and the principal men, threw the body of the king under the wall, and left it unburied, took about 3,000 Jews, among whom was Ezekiel, away captive to Babylon, and placed Jehoiakim's son, Jehoiachin, on the throne. Then that, fearing lest Jehoiachin might, out of revenge for his father's murder, lead the city to revolt, he sent an army to Jerusalem, but gave an oath to Jehoiachin that, in case the city should be taken, no harm should befall him. That then the king of Judah surrendered, in order to spare the city, but was nevertheless taken away into captivity with 10,000 other captives. It appears that Josephus was not able to harmonize the account in Chronicles with the account here, and so he mixed them both up together, not writing history but inventing it.—

The other text which may be cited against the construction of the history above given is Dan. i. 1: "In the third year of Jehoiakim, king of Judah, came Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon unto Jerusalem and besieged it (וַיִּצְרֵם [pressed it hard] see Isai. xxi. 2; Judges ix. 31; Esther viii. 11), and the Lord gave Jehoiakim king of Judah into his hand, with part of the vessels of the house of God," &c. It is true that this passage does not say that the city was besieged and taken, and that then the king was bound and taken away to Babylon. When the Chaldeans had driven the Egyptians out of Palestine, Jehoiakim found himself in great distress, and, in order not to lose his crown and his kingdom, he surrendered to the king of Babylon, gave him some of the temple ornaments and utensils, and, probably enough, also gave him certain hostages, among whom was Daniel. But the statement that this took place in the third year of Jehoiakim does not agree with the statements above quoted from Jeremiah. No one has yet succeeded in removing the discrepancy, although very many attempts have been made (see a critical analysis of these attempts by Rösch in Herzog's Real-Encyc. XVIII. s. 464). The latest of these attempts, that of Keil, which insists that we "must regard the third year of Jehoiakim, in Dan. i. 1, as the terminus a quo of Nebuchadnezzar's coming, i. e., must understand that statement to mean that Nebuchadnezzar began the expedition against Judah in that year; that Necho was defeated at Carchemish in the beginning of Jehoiakim's fourth year, and that, in consequence of this victory, Jerusalem was taken and Jehoiakim was made tributary in the same year," is unsatisfactory especially in view of Jerem. xxxvi. 9. There is scarcely any escape remaining except to assume that Daniel reckoned from some other point of time which we cannot now specify. It is not admissible to give his one statement the preference over the numerous chronological statements of Jeremiah, since these are consistent with one another, and with the historical connection, and are, moreover, as will be shown below in the review of the chronology of this period, in perfect harmony with all the other chronological data both in Jeremiah and in the Book of Kings, while the statement in Daniel, if it is taken as fixed and correct, introduces confusion. [See the Supplement. Note below.]

Ver. 2. And the Lord sent against him bands, &c. It is not stated what impelled Jehoiakim after three years to try to throw off the yoke of Nebuchadnezzar. Perhaps his courage rose again when Nebuchadnezzar had withdrawn and was fully occupied in other parts of his immense kingdom. Perhaps also he hoped for aid from Egypt. Before Nebuchadnezzar himself could come, "bands" (חֲבִילִים) in distinction from חָיִל, chap. xxv. 1, not an organized army) devastated the country, though they could not take the capital. "All the nationalities here mentioned had no doubt been obliged to recognize Nebuchadnezzar's supremacy, and they gratified their own hate against Judah at the same time that they served his purposes" (Thenius). The לְהַחֲרִיבֵהוּ does not refer to Jehoiakim (Luther: dass sie ihn umbrächten [that they might put him to death]), but to "Judah" which immediately precedes. This is evident from ver. 3. On vers. 2-4 Starke observes: "It is expressly said: 'The Lord sent,' and again: 'According to the word of the Lord,' and in ver. 3 again: 'Surely at the commandment of the Lord came this' (i. e., it came to pass only because the Lord had commanded it), and again in ver. 4: 'The Lord would not pardon,' in order that in all this the hand of God might appear and be recognized, and that men might not think that these judgments came upon Judah by accident, or merely on account of the physical strength of the Babylonians." The author means to say that the judgments which had long been threatened and predicted by the prophets (Isaiah, Micah, Huldah, Habakkuk, Jeremiah) now began. The invasion of all these bands on every side was the prelude of the downfall of the kingdom, for from this time on came one misfortune after the other, and the kingdom and nation moved on steadily towards their downfall.—Ver. 3. Only at the commandment of the Lord, i. e., it came only for the reason that God had so willed it. Instead of עַל־פִּי

Ewald and Thenius desire to read עַל־פִּי as in ver. 20, i. e., because of the wrath of God. The Sept. have: $\text{ἐν ὀργῇ κυρίου ἣν ἐπὶ τὸν Ἰουδαν}$; the Vulg. has: per verbum. The change in the text is not necessary. For the sins of Manasseh, see notes on chap. xxi. The sin of Manasseh was far greater and heavier than that of Jeroboam.

Judah gave itself up to this sin so entirely that not only were all the warnings and exhortations of the prophets ineffectual, but also the stern measures of Josiah could not effect anything in opposition; on the contrary, as we see from the words of Jeremiah, after his death this sin once more permeated the national life. The sins of Manasseh were not, therefore, avenged upon the people, but, because they persisted in them, they fell under the judgments of God. [That is, the nation was not punished under Jehoiakim for sins which Manasseh and his contemporaries had committed. The "sins of Manasseh" had become a designation for a certain class of offences, and a particular form of public and social depravity, which was introduced by Manasseh, but of which generation after generation continued to be guilty.—W. G. S.] Keil is mistaken when he thus states the connection between ver. 1 and ver. 2, and the following verses: "After God had given the nation into subjection to the Babylonian supremacy, as a punishment for its sins, every revolt against that power was a revolt against Him."—In ver. 6 we find the last reference to the Book of the Chronicles of the kings of Judah. The history of Jehoiakim therefore seems to have formed the conclusion to this book.

Ver. 6. So Jehoiakim slept with his fathers. The details which are given elsewhere in mentioning the death of a king, as to his burial and the place of his sepulture, are here wanting, certainly not through accident or error. Jeremiah says of Jehoiakim, chap. xxii. 19: "He shall be buried with the burial of an ass, drawn and cast forth beyond the gates of Jerusalem," and, chap. xxxvi. 30: "He shall have none to sit upon the throne of David, and his dead body shall be cast out in the day to the heat and in the night to the frost." As the statement that he "slept with his fathers" means neither more nor less than that he came to death, this text does not exclude or deny the fulfilment of the prophecy; nor can the statement which is interpolated in the Sept.: $\text{καὶ ἐκοιμήθη Ἰωακὴμ μετὰ τῶν πατέρων αὐτοῦ, καὶ ἐτάφη ἐν γαυζᾶν μετὰ τῶν πατέρων αὐτοῦ}$, for which there are no corresponding words in the Hebrew, avail, as Thenius believes, to prove the non-fulfilment of the prophecy. On the contrary, Ewald infers from the prophecy, which, however, he says "was written, in its present form, after the event," that the following is the circumstantial story of Jehoiakim's death: "Probably he had complied with a treacherous invitation of the enemy to visit his camp, for the purpose of making a treaty, and as soon as he came out he was taken prisoner in the very sight of his own capital. But as he resisted with rage and violence, he was borne away by force, and shamefully put to death. Even an honorable burial, for which his family no doubt entreated, was harshly refused." This representation of the incident goes beyond the prophecy even, and builds history upon it. Winer supposes that Jehoiakim's body was thrown out after, and in consequence of, the capture of the city in the reign of Jehoiachin (ver. 10), "on which occasion either the enemy, or perhaps the inhabitants of Jerusalem themselves, showed their rage against the hated king," but, according to Jeremiah, he met with no burial at all. We therefore limit ourselves to the assumption, which is also made by Keil, "that he perished in a battle with some one of the irregular marauding bands mentioned above, and was not buried."—Ver. 7. And the king of Egypt came not again any more, &c. This remark is here inserted in order to show under what circumstances Jehoiachin succeeded his father (ver. 6), and how it came that he only reigned for so short a time (ver. 8). Necho had retired finally from Asia after such losses that he could not venture again to meet his victorious enemy, therefore Judah could expect no more support from him. Much less could it attempt alone to resist the conqueror from whom it had revolted. The river of Egypt is not the Nile, but the stream now known as Ariah, which forms the southern boundary of Palestine (1 Kings viii. 65; Isai. xxvii. 12).

Ver. 8. Jehoiachin was eighteen years old, &c. The form of the name יהויכין which occurs here and in Chronicles (II. xxxvi. 8, 9), is the full and original form. The signification is "He-whom-Jehovah-confirms." In Ezek. i. 2 we find יהויכין;

in Jer. xxvii. 20; xxviii. 4: וְיִכְנְיָהוּ; and in Jer.

xxii. 24, 28: כְּנִיָּהוּ, which last is probably a popular abbreviation of the name. Instead of eighteen years the chronicler gives eight years, evidently through an omission of 10. The grounds adduced by Hitzig (note on Jer. xxii. 28) in favor of eight are swept away by ver. 15 of this chapter, where the king's "wives" are mentioned. There is no reason to cast suspicion upon the more accurate statement of the chronicler: "three months and ten days," as Thenius does. Elnathan belonged to the שָׂרִים at the court of Jehoiakim, Jerem.

xxvi. 22; xxxvi. 12, 25.—Ver. 10. At that time, &c. The chronicler says instead: "When the year was expired" [more correctly it would read: "At the turning-point of the year," i. e., either the spring equinox, or the beginning of the Jewish year, both of which came at nearly the same time; the time at which military movements were commenced], i. e., in the spring, not "late in the summer or in the autumn" (Thenius). Nebuchadnezzar sent out his generals (שָׂרִים), in the first place, with the army to besiege the city. Afterwards he came himself, in order to be present at the capture (see notes on ver. 2).—And Jehoiachin, king of Judah, went out, &c., ver. 12. יָצָא, as in chap. xviii. 31, is the ordinary expression for besieged who go out to surrender to the besiegers (1 Sam. xi. 3; Jerem. xxi. 9; xxxviii. 17). Jehoiachin perceived that the city would not be able to hold out very long, and therefore determined to surrender, in the hope of meeting with grace from Nebuchadnezzar, and of being allowed to keep his kingdom, though as a vassal. He therefore went out with his mother as the Gebirah (1 Kings xv. 13), and with his ministers and officers, but his hopes were all disappointed. Nebuchadnezzar distrusted him, not without reason, and he desired to punish the father in the son. וַיִּקַּח, he seized him, not "he received him graciously" (Luther and the Calv. Bib.), for, if the latter were the meaning, he would have restored him as a vassal, but he dethroned him and took him into exile. The eighth year of Nebuchadnezzar, who became king in the fourth year of Jehoiakim (Jer. xxv. 1), fell in the year after the eleven-year reign of Jehoiakim had closed. On Jerem. lii. 28 sq. see below.

Ver. 13. And he carried out thence, &c., that is, from the city which he had entered after seizing the king and his chief men. In the first place he took all there was in the treasures of the temple and the royal palace, and then he took the utensils of the temple. The meaning of וְיָקַץ is not altogether clear. "To tear off the gold surface" (Keil) is a meaning which is not applicable to "all the vessels," for many of these were entirely of gold, as, for instance, the candlesticks, and such, we may be sure, he did not leave behind. The Sept. have συνέκοψε, the Vulg. concidit or confregit (chap. xviii. 16), hence Thenius renders it: "to crush into shapeless masses," but, if this had been done, Cyrus would not have been able to give these articles back again to the Jews, as it is stated in Ez. i. 7-11 that he did do. We must understand it to mean, to tear away violently, avellit (Winer), for the most of these articles were no doubt fastened to the floor of the temple. וְיָקַץ does not mean the temple as a whole, but the sanctuary, the "dwelling," all the articles in which were of gold. Nebuchadnezzar did not take away the brazen vessels from the forecourt until he destroyed Jerusalem (chap. xxv. 13 sq.).—As the Lord had said, chap. xx. 17; cf. Jerem. xv. 13; xvii. 3.—Ver. 14. And he carried away captive all Jerusalem. He left only the poorest and humblest of the population, because nothing was to be feared from them (see Jerem. xxxix. 10: "the poor of the people which had nothing"). Ver. 14 states in general, and in round numbers, what persons were taken into exile. There were two classes: first, the שָׂרִים, the chiefs [E. V.

"princes"], not the military chiefs, but the chief men of rank, the nobles, and the גִּבּוֹרֵי הָחַיִל,

i. e., the mighty men of wealth, the rich (chap. xv. 20); and second, the הָחָרָשׁ, the artisans, the workers either in brass, or iron, or wood (Isai. xlii. 12, 13; Gen. iv. 22; 1 Kings vii. 14). וְהַסֹּנֵי,

i. e., not "common laborers who broke stone and carried burdens" (Hitzig on Jerem. xxiv. 1), but, literally, one who shuts in, encloses, or locks up, from סָנַר, to close, or shut up, and so, according to Ewald: "persons who are skilled in siege operations (from הִסְנִיר, to invest or enclose, cf. Jerem. xiii. 19)," but we prefer to understand by it locksmiths, inasmuch as these also made weapons (1 Sam. xiii. 19). When these persons were taken away into captivity the rest were deprived of the power to revolt or to make war. There were in all ten thousand of the exiles. Vers. 15 and 16 are not a mere repetition of ver. 14; they particularize what ver. 14 stated in general. The king and his court are mentioned first, then the אֲנֹכֵי הָאָרֶץ

(keri, אֲנִי, that is, the mighty men of the land, who are included in the שָׂרִים in ver. 14,

then the אֲנֹכֵי הָחַיִל, who are there called גִּבּוֹרֵי הָחַיִל. There were seven thousand of the rich and noble, and one thousand of the two classes of artisans. וְכָל הָעָם in ver. 16 (not וְכָל) "gathers in one all who have been mentioned, and it is then specified in regard to them that they were all men in the prime of life, and that they were familiar with the use of weapons" (Thenius). We see from Jerem. xxix. that there were also priests and prophets among them, and according to Josephus, (Antiq. x. 6, 3) especially ὁ προφήτης Ἰεζεκιήλος καὶ ὧν. Cf. Ezek. i. 1-3. Ver. 17. Mattaniah was, according to 1 Chron. iii. 15, the third son of Josiah, so that he was the uncle of the exiled king Jehoiachin (Jerem. xxxvii. 1). יְהוֹיָכִן, 2 Chron.

xxxvi. 10, must not, therefore, be translated: "his brother," but: "his cousin," or, "his relative," a sense in which it frequently occurs. (Sept. ἀδελφὸν τοῦ πατρὸς αὐτοῦ). On the change of name see notes on chap. xxiii. 34. Nebuchadnezzar did not choose the name, he only approved of the new name chosen by the king, as Necho had done in the case of Jehoiakim. יָדֹן, gift, is changed to יָדֹן, justice, righteousness, so that the name means: "the righteousness of Jehovah," that is, "he by whom Jehovah executes justice." It is hardly probable that the king meant by this name to identify himself with יְהוָה יָדֹן promised by Jeremiah (xxiii. 6), as Hengstenberg and Von Gerlach think; it is much more likely that the prophet took occasion from the king's name, with which his character did not at all correspond, to promise that one should come to whom alone this name might justly be applied.—Nebuchadnezzar showed himself merciful in that he put another member of the native dynasty on the throne, and did not appoint a stranger and foreigner as viceroy.

Ver. 18. Zedekiah was twenty and one years old. Of the passage from this verse on to the end of the book, Jerem. lii. 1-34 is a duplicate, almost word for word. The only differences are that Jerem. lacks 2 Kings xxv. 22-26, and 2 Kings lacks Jerem. lii. 28-30. It follows that neither one is borrowed from the other. Moreover there are also a few other slight differences, as, for instance, 2 Kings xxv. 16, 17 compared with Jerem. lii. 20-23. It is certain that the fifty-second chapter of Jeremiah is an appendix to the discourses of that prophet, and that it does not come from his hand, for it is impossible that he should have survived the liberation of Jehoiachin (ver. 31). (See the Introd. § 1.) Although it is not true that the text in Kings is "thoroughly corrupt" (Hitzig), yet that in Jerem. is, on the whole, to be preferred, and is therefore the more original. On the other hand, that of Kings has some peculiar excellences, as, for instance, xxv. 6, 7, 11, 17 compared with Jerem. lii. 9, 10, 15, 20. We are driven to a conclusion similar to that which we reached in regard to the history of Hezekiah (see p. 201), and which is adopted also by Keil and Thenius, that both narratives were borrowed from one source which is now lost.—The mother of Zedekiah was also, according to chap. xxiii. 31, the mother of Jehoahaz; he was, therefore, the full brother of the latter, and the step-brother of Jehoiakim (xxiii. 36). On ver. 20 see notes on xxiv. 3. The author means to say that, as this king and the people persisted in their evil ways, the judgment which had long been threatened was executed in this reign. The special occasion of it was his revolt from Nebuchadnezzar who had put him upon the throne, and, according to 2 Chron. xxxvi. 13 and Ezek. xvii. 13, had taken an oath of fidelity from him. The year of this revolt cannot be accurately determined. At the commencement of his reign he sent an embassy to Babylon, as it seems, in order to bring about the release of the captives who had been carried away under Jehoiachin (Jerem. xxix. 3 sq.). In his fourth year he himself went thither with Seraiah, probably with the same intention, but in vain (Jerem. li. 59). Then came ambassadors from the neighboring peoples who wanted to unite with Zedekiah in a common effort to cast off the Babylonian yoke (Jerem. xxvii. 3). False prophets encouraged him to agree to this (Jerem. xxviii.). This led him to send to Egypt "that they might give him horses and much people" (Ezek. xvii. 15). As the Chaldean army was before Jerusalem in Zedekiah's ninth year, the revolt must have taken place, at the latest, in his eighth year, but it probably took place in his seventh, or perhaps even earlier.

Chap. xxv. 1. And it came to pass in the ninth year, &c. These dates can be given thus accurately to the month and the day, because the Jews were accustomed during the exile to fast on the anniversary of these days of disaster (Zach. vii. 3, 5; viii. 19). It is evident from ver. 6 that Nebuchadnezzar did not come to Jerusalem himself, but remained at Riblah (chap. xxiii. 33), and sent his army from thence against Jerusalem. According to Jerem. xxxiv. 7 they also besieged Lachish and Azekah, the only two strongholds remaining. The word יָקֵן cannot mean a "wall" (De Wette), for it stands in contrast with סִלְלָה as something different (Ezek. iv. 2; xvii. 17; xxi. 27). It is ordinarily derived from קָנָה speculari, to observe, to watch, and is understood to mean a "watch-tower," or, collectively, "watch-towers" (Hävernick on Ezek.

iv. 2; Gesenius, Keil), but קִיבֵּי, which does not refer to observation but to an encircling on all sides, does not fit this meaning. The Sept. translate it in Ezek. iv. 2, by προμαχών, a bulwark, a rampart, in Ezek. xvii. 17; xxi. 27 by βελοσταύς, a machine for throwing missiles, and this place they translate: περιφοδόμησεν ἐπ' αὐτὴν τείχος κύκλω; the Vulg. has munitiones. Hitzig understands by it "lines of circumvallation," and Thenius "the outermost of the siege lines, built only of palisades, and intended to prevent the introduction of supplies," &c., but this last cannot be so accurately determined. We must, therefore, content ourselves with the less definite meaning, "bulwark," or, "siege-work." Vatablus: Machinam bellicam, quatuorvalis fuerit.—Ver. 2. Unto the eleventh year, &c. The siege lasted in all one year five months and twenty-seven days, for the city was very strongly fortified (2 Chron. xxxii. 5; xxxiii. 14). This is conclusive against the assumption that a capture of the city is implied in xxiv. 1 sq. According to Jerem. xxxvii. 5, 11, the besieging army, or at least a part of it, raised the siege and marched against the Egyptian army which was coming to the help of the Jews. It would thus appear that the siege was interrupted for a time.—Jeremiah gives the date in ver. 3 more accurately (see Jerem. xxxix. 2, and lii. 6): "In the fourth month, on the ninth

[day] of the month." The first words יְהוֹשִׁיָּהוּ הָרִבִּי have been omitted by some accident in the version in Kings, and they must be supplied. How severe the famine was, and what horrors came to pass as a consequence of it, may be seen from Lament. ii. 11, 12, 19; iv. 3-10 (Ezek. v. 10; Baruch ii. 3). See also Jerem. xxxvii. 21. The famine did not begin on the ninth of the fourth month, but had become so severe at that time that the people were no longer capable of making a strong resistance; so on that day the enemy was able to storm the city.

Ver. 4. And a breach was made in the city. This breach was on the north side, for, according to Jerem. xxxix. 3, the leaders of the Chaldean army, when they came in, halted and seated themselves in "the middle gate," that is, in the gate which was in the wall between the upper, southern city (Zioun), and the lower northern city, and which led from one of these into the other. When the king learned of this he took to flight with his warriors by night. In the text before us not only is "Zedekiah, king of Judah" (Jerem. xxxix. 4) omitted after וַהֲרֹחַ, but also the predicate וַיִּמָּצֵא (Jerem. xxxix. 4; lii. 7) is omitted after "men of war."

All the old versions supply at least one of these words. They fled towards the south, because the enemy had penetrated by the north side, and there was no hope of escaping that way, but even on this side they had to fight their way through, for the Chaldeans had invested the entire city (סָבִיב). The attempt derived its only hope of success from the darkness, and from the greater weakness of the besieging force on the south side.

—By the way of the gate between, &c. This gate, called the gate of the fountain (Nehem. iii. 15), was at the southern end of the ravine between Ophel and Zion, the Tyropoion. At this point, inasmuch as it was the site of the pool of Siloam and there were cisterns to be protected, and inasmuch also as the formation of the ground made it a convenient place for the enemy to attack (Thenius), two walls had been built, between which was this gate (Sept.: ὁδὸν πύλης τῆς ἀνὰ μέσον τῶν τευχῶν, and in Jerem. lii. 7: ἀνὰ μέσον τοῦ τεύχους καὶ τοῦ ποταμίσκου). This double wall is also mentioned in Isai. xxii. 11. The way of the gate is the way through that gate out of the city. It is not quite certain whether the king's garden was inside or outside of this double wall; Thenius assumes that it was outside (see Map of Jerusalem Before the Exile, appended to his commentary). It is said in Ezek. xii. 12: "The prince . . . shall bear upon his shoulder in the twilight, and shall go forth; they shall dig through the wall (בְּקִיר) to carry [him] out thereby." Here קִיר cannot be understood to refer to either of those walls, for he went through the gate; moreover it would have been impossible to break through such a wall in the night. We must therefore understand it of that wall which the enemy had built all around the city (ver. 1), and which it was necessary to break through. The fugitives then took the way to the plain (הַעֲרֵבָה), that is, to the plains or meadows through which the Jordan flows, and which were called the plain (Josh. xi. 2; xii. 3; 2 Sam. ii. 29; iv. 7). Their intention was to cross the Jordan and escape, but they were overtaken near Jericho, six hours' journey from Jerusalem.

Ver. 6. So they took the king, &c. On Riblah see notes on chap. xxiii. 33. "Nebuchadnezzar was not present at the storming of Jerusalem (Jerem. xxxix. 3), he awaited the result in his camp" (Thenius). Instead of the plurals וַיִּמָּצְאוּ and וַיִּשְׁפְּטוּ in ver. 7, we find in Jerem. xxxix. 5 and lii. 9 the singular with Nebuchadnezzar as the subject. Although the latter may be the more original reading, the sense is the same in either case, for Nebuchadnezzar certainly did not put Zedekiah's sons to death with his own hand; he appointed a tribunal which judged and executed them. Instead of the singular וַיִּשְׁפֹּט Jeremiah has, in the places quoted and elsewhere, the plural, וַיִּשְׁפְּטוּם. With וַיִּבְרַךְ it means, to deal with and decide a question of law. This trial cannot have occupied much time, for it was a matter of common notoriety that Zedekiah had broken his oath of allegiance and revolted. The sons of Zedekiah, not all his children, had fled with him. They also were regarded as rebels and put to death, in order to put an end to the dynasty. His daughters were taken away as captives according to Jerem. xli. 20. As for Zedekiah himself, he was to suffer a painful punishment as long as he lived. His eyes were put out. This form of punishment was used by the Chaldeans and ancient Persians (Herod. vii. 18). Princes are still disabled in this way in Persia when it is desired to deprive them of any prospect of the throne. "A rod of silver (or of brass), heated glowing hot, is passed over the open eye" (Winer, R.-W.-B. II. s. 15). The Vulg. has oculos ejus effudit, and on Jerem. lii. 11: oculos cruciavit. It was also a customary mode of punishment in the Orient to pierce out the eyes (Ctes. Pers. 5). "Plate No. 18 in Botta (Monum. de Nin.) represents a king who is in the act of piercing out with a lance the eyes of a captive of no ordinary rank who kneels before him" (Thenius). See Cassel on Judges xvi. 21. However the act of piercing out the eyes is not generally expressed by וַיִּבְרַךְ, but by וַיִּבְרַךְ, Judges xvi. 21; 1 Sam. xi. 2; Numb. xvi. 14.—

With fetters of brass, and double fetters at that, וּבְמִשְׁכָּלִים. He was doubly fettered hand and foot, and brought to Babylon. In Jerem. lii. 11 the words follow: "And put him in prison till the day of his death." The Sept. have: εἰς οἰκίαν μύλωνος, evidently having in mind Judges xvi. 21. The author of the Book of Kings may have thought that this statement was unnecessary, since every person who was in chains was put in the prison as a matter of course. According to Jerem. xxxix. 6, and lii. 10, "All the nobles of Judah" were put to death with the sons of Zedekiah, that is, those who had fled with him. There is no reason to regard this as a false feature of the story borrowed from 2 Kings xxv. 21, as Thenius does.

[SUPPLEMENTARY NOTE on contemporaneous history. In the note on p. 247 we brought our notice of contemporaneous history down to the year 640, the year in which Josiah ascended the throne. The commotion of the next sixty years, during which Assyria ceased to be a nation, Egypt was humbled, and the Median and Babylonian empires advanced to the first place, amounted to an historical cataclysm. In the Bible we have references to these movements only when, and in so far as, they affected the fortunes of the Jewish people. This they did in the most important manner, and, in order to understand the influence of the neighboring nations on Judah at this time, it is necessary to have a comprehensive, if not exhaustive, knowledge of the historical movements which were in progress in Asia.

It should be distinctly understood that the history of the period now before us is very obscure. We have no historical inscriptions to guide us, and are thrown upon the authority of literary remains which are imperfect and inconsistent. Our chief authorities, Rawlinson and Lenormant (Sir H. Rawlinson and Oppert) differ very materially. It is therefore to be understood that what is here given is only conjectural and provisional.

The great question in dispute, on which the adjustment of the fragments of information which we possess into a smooth narrative depends, is as to the year in which Nineveh was taken, whether it was in 625 (Rawlinson), or in 606 (Lenormant). The weight of authority is in favor of the latter, though it is open to serious historical objections. It is, at present, impossible to bring this question to a final decision.

In 640 Asshur-edil-ilani (L.), or, Asshur-emi-dil-in (R.) was on the throne of Assyria. His reign ended about 626-5. Rawlinson, putting the fall of Nineveh at this date, identifies this king with the Saracus, or Assaracus, of Abydenus. Lenormant, putting the fall of Nineveh in 606, supposes that Saracus was another and the last king, who reigned from 625 to 606. The last king was far inferior to his ancestors. Under him the empire was unable to meet the attacks which fell upon it.

The Medes, whose first attack on Assyria, under Phraortes, we mentioned above (p. 247), were a hardy mountain people who now arose into prominence. Cyaxares, the successor of Phraortes, made elaborate preparations to renew the attempts at conquest towards the west. He was ready for the attack (Rawl.), or made it (Lenor.), either alone (R.) or in conjunction with the Chaldeans, under Nabopolassar (L.), either in 634 (R.) or in 625 (L.). This attack was interrupted by the appearance of new actors on the scene. A horde of barbarians from the north, Scythia, poured down upon the nations in the Euphrates valley. They were of the same origin as the Goths, Huns, Avari, and Vandals, who appeared in Europe early in the Christian era, and their behavior, whithersoever they came, was the same as that of the barbarians who entered Europe. They poured over Media, Assyria, and Babylonia, and spread westward into Syria and Palestine. On the borders of Egypt they found Psammetichus besieging Ashdod. He persuaded them by gifts to turn back, and thus checked their advance in this direction. Herodotus says that their sway lasted for nineteen years. It is difficult to tell what this means, for in some countries, Media for instance, the natives overcame them sooner than in others. They were not able to found any permanent authority in any country. They perished by luxury and vice, were slain, or employed as mercenaries. Jeremiah refers to them in chap. vi. 22 sq.; viii. 16; ix. 10; v. 15, and, in the 50th chap., where he foretells the destruction of Babylon, the Scythian invasion furnishes the colors of the picture in which he describes it. Rawlinson puts their invasion in 632; Lenormant in 625. Rawlinson supposes, that after the Scythian invasion had subsided, the Medes renewed the attack on Nineveh, and secured the alliance of Nabopolassar, in 625, when Nineveh was taken and destroyed.

In 610 Psammetichus died, and Necho succeeded on the throne of Egypt. Necho reigned from 610 to 595. He was young and ambitious, and he planned an expedition into Asia, no doubt, if Assyria had already fallen, with the intention of winning the western provinces for himself. He marched through Philistia and Samaria. Here Josiah of Judah marched out to meet him (chap. xxiii. 29). We do not need to seek far for a reason for Josiah's action. It may have been inspired, as is generally supposed, by a desire to manifest fidelity to his suzerain, Babylon (R.), but it is a more simple explanation to notice that, under the existing weakness of Assyria, Josiah had been able to exercise sovereignty over some portion of Samaria (chap. xxiii. 15 sq.). If the Babylonians were already the supreme power, they had not interfered with this. If Egypt conquered Samaria, it was at an end. Josiah, therefore, had a very natural and simple interest in opposing the Egyptian invasion. If Necho intended at this time to measure his strength with the Babylonians, he certainly desisted from that project. The words in 2 Chron. xxxv. 21 throw no light on the party he intended to attack. There is ground here for believing that Nineveh had not yet fallen, and that the Babylonians had not yet displayed their power. Necho saw in the feebleness of Assyria an opportunity to conquer its western provinces, and the force which he had was probably only such an one as he considered necessary for this purpose. Josiah was not, therefore, as rash as we might at first suppose (cf. Ewald III. 762—3d ed. He seems to think, however, that Necho may have taken Carchemish at this time, cf. ss. 782-3). However, the Jewish king was killed in the battle, and his second son Jehoahaz was made king. Necho pursued his course of conquest with success for three months. On his return, he regarded Judah also, by virtue of his victory at Megiddo, as a conquered province, although he had declared at the outset that he had no hostile design against that country (2 Chron. xxxv. 21). He refused to ratify the election of Jehoahaz, but took him (probably sent a detachment to bring him) from Jerusalem to the camp at Riblah (chap. xxiii. 33), where he put him in chains, and carried him captive to Egypt. He made Judah tributary. Jeremiah (xxii. 10) calls Jehoahaz more worthy of pity in his captivity than his father in his death, and Ewald, with good reason, interprets the parable (Ezek. xix., especially vers. 2-4) of Jehoakim. Necho put the elder brother Eliakim on the throne, changing his name to Jehoiakim (chap. xxiii. 34). This was in 609 or 608. Necho at this time took Gaza (Jerem. xlvii. 1), and remained sovereign over the western provinces for two or three years.

We come now to the year 606 in which Nineveh was taken according to Oppert, Lenormant, Ewald, and others. The historical features of this event, aside from the question of its date, are as follows. The king of Assyria sent to Babylon, as satrap, a general named Nabopolassar (Neboprotects-myson), probably an Assyrian. It is certain that, when the final attack was made, it was twofold, both from Media and from the south. Nabopolassar and Cyaxares formed an alliance which was cemented by the marriage of Nebuchadnezzar, son of Nabopolassar, with Amyitis, daughter of Cyaxares. Rawlinson's idea is that Nabopolassar was charged with the defence against the attack from the south, but turned traitor. This supposition is necessary since he does not think that the Chaldeans participated in the first attack. Lenormant supposes that Nabopolassar was sent to Babylon as satrap, that he matured plans of revolt, that he joined in the first attack, and that he employed the interval of nineteen years in establishing his independence. He also thinks that Nabopolassar was, in 607, an old and broken man, that he associated his son Nebuchadnezzar with himself on the throne in that year, and that, therefore, the capture of Nineveh is really to be reckoned among the exploits of that prince. He supposes that certain chronological discrepancies are to be accounted for by the fact that Nebuchadnezzar became joint ruler in 607, so that two starting-points for his reign were confused. (See chap. xxv. 8, and Jerem. lii. 28-30.) The attack of the confederated Medes and Chaldeans was successful, and Saracus perished with his court and treasures in the downfall of the city.

Nebuchadnezzar now becomes the chief figure in the drama. He was a prince of extraordinary talents and energy, and he consolidated, if we may not say that he actually established, the Babylonian monarchy. Having destroyed Nineveh, his next task was to recover that portion of his new conquest which the Egyptians had held in possession for two or three years. In 605, the fourth year of Jehoiakim (Jerem. xli. 2), he met Necho, who came out to defend his possessions, at Carchemish, on the Euphrates, and totally defeated him. He pursued the Egyptians to the border of Egypt (chap. xxiv. 7), and no doubt intended to push on into that country, when news came to him (604) that his father was dead. He hastened to Babylon with a small escort through the nearer, but more dangerous, way of the desert. He met with no opposition in ascending the throne, in the fourth year of Jehoiakim of Judah (Jerem. xxv. 1).

In the haste of these movements, Judah had remained secure in its mountains. Nebuchadnezzar's army marched to Egypt in two columns, one through Philistia and one through Perea (Lenormant). But Nebuchadnezzar soon returned to Palestine and Phœnicia to complete the work of conquest. In 602 or 601 he made Jehoiakim tributary (chap. xxiv. 1) and took away certain hostages or captives. In 599 or 598 Jehoiakim planned a revolt (chap. xxiv. 1), relying on help from Egypt. Rawlinson thinks that the embassy mentioned in Jer. xxvi. 22 had for its object to form this alliance, and that the matter of Urijah was only a pretext. Nebuchadnezzar first incited the neighboring nations against him (chap. xxiv. 2), and then himself marched into Judah. Jehoiakim died at this time, and Jehoiachin, his son, succeeded (chap. xxiv. 8). He was not able to resist the Chaldeans, and surrendered at discretion (chap. xxiv. 12). He was taken away prisoner, with 10,000 other captives (chap. xxiv. 13 and 14), the most energetic and independent portion of the people. The city and temple were plundered, and Mattaniah, the youngest son of Josiah, was put upon the throne by Nebuchadnezzar, under the name of Zedekiah (xxiv. 17).

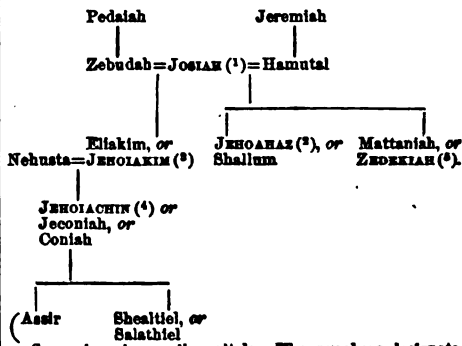

Lenormant justly says of Zedekiah that he was only a Babylonian satrap. A strong party urged him continually to revolt, but Jeremiah counselled patience and submission. In 595 the princes of the neighboring countries met at Jerusalem (Jerem. xxvii. 3) to plan a concerted revolt, but Zedekiah was persuaded by Jeremiah to renounce this plan (Jerem. xxvii.). He went to Babylon (in his fourth year, 594) to counteract suspicions of his fidelity which had been aroused (Jer. li. 59). However, he again cherished similar plans, and entered into negotiations with Uparahet (Uaphris, Apries, Hophra) of Egypt. The Chaldeans again invaded Judah in 590. The siege of Jerusalem began early in January, 589 (Lenorm.). During this siege the serfs were manumitted, that they might help in the defence (Jerem. xxxiv.). The Egyptians advanced to the relief of Jerusalem, the Chaldeans turned to meet the attack, and the hopes of the Jews revived so far that the freedmen were once more enslaved. This diversion, however, produced no effect. It is uncertain whether a battle was really fought and lost by the Egyptians (Josephus, Antiq. X. vii. 3), or whether they retreated without fighting at all. In 588 a breach was made and the Chaldeans entered the city (xxv. 3 and 4). Zedekiah fled (xxv. 4), hoping to break through the investing lines, but he was captured and taken to Riblah (xxv. 6), where Nebuchadnezzar was encamped. His sons were slain before his eyes. He was then blinded and taken captive to Babylon. One month later (xxv. 8, cf. xxv. 3) Nebuzaradan was deputed to carry out the systematic destruction of Jerusalem, and deportation of the most influential of its population. This he did thoroughly, though not without some slight leniency (chap. xxv. 12-22). However, the fanaticism of Ishmael and his party destroyed the last hope of maintaining the Jewish nationality, even in the pitiful form in which the Chaldeans had yet spared it (xxv. 25). The history of Judah, from this time on, is merged in that of the great world-monarchies.—W. G. S.]

HISTORICAL AND ETHICAL

*1. The author treats very curtly the history of the last four kings of Judah. In Chronicles we find a still more abbreviated account. He passes hastily over this part of the history of Judah, just as he did over the similar part of the history of Israel (see p. 162 sq.), for it is the twenty-three years of the "death-agony of the nation" (Ewald). Josiah was the last genuine theocratic king. With his death begins the end of the kingdom; the history of his four successors, three of whom were his sons and one his grandson, is nothing more than the story of this end. The author tells no more in regard to them than appears to him from his theocratic and pragmatic standpoint to be absolutely necessary. So he tells first what the attitude of each was towards Jehovah, that is, toward the covenant or the Mosaic law, and then so much of their history as pertains to the downfall of the kingdom, which was approaching step by step. We therefore learn rather what happened to them according to the counsel of God than what they themselves did. Essential additions to the history are contributed by Jeremiah, especially by the historical portions, but also by the prophetic discourses, though it is not always easy to determine which reign these latter belong to, nor what events they refer to. It is very remarkable that this great prophet, who certainly was an important personage during these last four reigns, and who is one of the most remarkable individuals mentioned in the Old Testament, is not mentioned or referred to at all in the historical book, perhaps for the reason that the acquaintance of the readers with the book of the prophet is taken for granted. [This is one reason for thinking that Jeremiah himself wrote the Books of Kings. See Introd. § 1.—W. G. S.]

* [GENEALOGICAL TABLE OF THE LAST KINGS OF JUDAH.]

Sovereigns in small capitals. The numbers designate the order of succession on the throne.—W. G. S.]

2. The reign of king Jehoahaz, although it only lasted for three months, had important influence on the course of the history, inasmuch as it broke with Josiah's theocratic régime, and introduced another policy which hastened on the downfall of the kingdom. All that Josiah had built up with such anxious care and labor fell in ruins in a few months. Although the Jehovah-worship was not formally abrogated again, yet the door was opened for all manner of heathen falsehood and corruption to re-enter, and no one of the following kings abandoned the new policy which was thus inaugurated. This is the heavy guilt which rests upon Jehoahaz. How he came to adopt this course we can only guess, since we have no explanation of it offered in the Scriptures. The notion of some of the old expositors, that he was seduced by his mother, is entirely without foundation, and is especially improbable as she came from the ancient priest-city Libnah, and so cannot certainly have been bred to idolatry. It is much more probable that the heathen-party, to which many persons of rank and influence belonged, but which had been repressed under Josiah, arose once more after his death, and sought to regain its power. He either brought them over to his side or sought to win them by concessions. It does indeed seem probable, from the course which Necho adopted towards him, that "he continued to be hostile to Egypt" (Ewald), but the text nowhere states that "he resisted unworthy proposals of the Egyptian king." Niemeyer (Character der Bibel V. s. 105) says of him: "When compared with his elder brothers and successors, he seems to have been superior to them in many respects. One passage in Jeremiah would almost lead us to the opinion that the people longed for his return from Egypt." Umbreit also remarks on Jerem. xxii. 11 sq.: "He seems, during his reign of three months, to have made himself very much beloved." But it by no means follows, because the people passed over his elder brothers to make him king, that he was in any way better than they, for he certainly did not fulfil any hopes which may have been formed in regard to him, and Josephus (Antiq. X. v. 2), who certainly would not contradict the general verdict in regard to him which had been crystallized in tradition, calls him ἀσέβης καὶ μαρὸς τὸν πρόγον. As for the text, Jerem. xxii. 10-12, in which he is called Shallum, it certainly cannot mean that Shallum deserved to be lamented more than the model king, Josiah, who walked in the way of his father David, and turned neither to the right hand nor to the left, whereas Jehoahaz followed in the ways of Ahaz, Manasseh, and Amon (chap. xxii. 2; xxiii. 32). The prophet there threatens the house of David (ver. 1) with destruction, because it has abandoned the covenant of Jehovah (vers. 5-9). He says that one king has already been carried away captive out of his land,—the land of promise,—that he will die and be buried in a foreign land (a great calamity and disgrace, according to Israelitish notions), and that another will be cast out before the city like a dead animal and find no burial at all. There is, therefore, no syllable here of desire and longing on the part of the people for the return of Jehoahaz as one who was better than the rest. Why should the people long for the return of a king who had disappointed all their hopes and expectations?

3. Josephus says (Antiq. X. v. 2) of king Jehoia-akim: ἐτίγχευεν ἐν τῇν φύσιν ἀδίκος καὶ κακοῦργος, καὶ μήτε πρὸς θεὸν δούλος, μήτε πρὸς ἀνθρώπους ἐλευτης. The correctness of this criticism appears especially from the passages in Jeremiah which serve as supplements to the history before us, Jerem. xxii. 13-19; xxvi. 20-24; xxxvi. 20-32. The idol-worship which Jehoahaz had tolerated once more grew and spread with great rapidity under Jehoia-akim. All the abominations which had existed under Manasseh reappeared. Ewald and Vaihinger infer from Ezek. viii. 7-13 that he "added to" the Asiatic forms of idolatry which had existed under Manasseh, "by introducing also the Egyptian cultus," but the reference in that passage is to the worship of Thammuz (Adonis), a well-known deity of Western Asia, the chief seat of whose worship was the ancient Phœnician city of Byblus, and to whose cultus belong the representations of worms and unclean animals on the walls (ver. 10.—See Hävernick on Ezek. s. 98 and 108). Moreover, the question may be raised whether this cultus was introduced under Jehoia-akim, or not until the reign of Zedekiah. However that may be, there is no hint of any Egyptian cultus under Jehoia-akim, although he was a vassal of Egypt, and in fact there is no hint at all of any Egyptian forms of idolatry among the Hebrews. Jehoia-akim was the tool of the heathen party; he not only did not listen to the prophets, he hated and persecuted them. He caused the prophet Urijah, who had fled from him to Egypt, to be brought back from thence, to be put to death, and then his corpse to be shamefully handled (Jerem. xxvi. 20-24). Jeremiah barely escaped death (Jerem. xxxvi. 26). 2 Kings xxiv. 3 and 4 also shows that Jehoia-akim shed much innocent blood. He had also a passion for building, and he caused expensive structures to be erected unjustly, and without paying wages to the laborers. [Jerem. xxii. 13 sq.] He exacted the tribute which Necho had imposed upon him from the people instead of using the royal treasures for this purpose. Even after the resources of the country were exhausted he continued his exactions so that the courageous prophet rebuked him: "Thine eyes and thine heart are not but for thy covetousness, and for to shed innocent blood, and for oppression, and for violence to do it" (Jerem. xxii. 17). Therefore the prophet warns him that he will not be lamented nor buried, but that, in spite of all his royal grandeur and glory, he will be dragged forth and cast upon the field like a dead ass. No doubt he early showed what sort of a disposition he had, and it is not strange that the people, after Josiah's death, passed him over and made his brother king. He was a tyrant who was forced upon the nation by a victorious enemy, through whom it was punished for its apostasy. His reign formed a part of the divine judgment which had already begun to fall.

4. King Jehoiachin is placed before us by both the historical narratives (2 Kings xxiv. 9; 2 Chron. xxxvi. 9) as just like the three other kings as regards his attitude towards Jehovah. It is simply said of him without restriction: "He did that which was evil in the sight of Jehovah, like to all that his father had done." The only thing further which is related in regard to him is that, when the Babylonian army appeared before Jerusalem to besiege it, he went out and surrendered himself, begging for mercy. Josephus (Antiq. X. vii. 1) regards this as a praiseworthy action. He says: ὁ δὲ φέρεται χρηστός ὢν καὶ δίκαιος οὐκ ᾔδειν τὴν πόλιν κινδυνεύουσαν δι' αὐτὸν περιφύειν; that the king had a solemn promise from the generals whom Nebuchadnezzar had sent that no harm should happen to him or to the city, but that this promise was broken, for Nebuchadnezzar had given orders that all who were in the city should be taken captive and brought into his presence. Niemeyer also says (Charact. d. B. V. s. 107): "Jehoiachin, the son of Jehoiakim, was undeniably a better king than his father. He does that which wisdom and humanity require under the circumstances. He desists from the active prosecution of a revolt which could only result in greater cruelty from the enemy, and greater exhaustion of the land, which was already thoroughly worn out. He must have been regarded, even in his captivity, as a man who deserved great respect (Jerem. lili. 31)." Similarly Ewald (Gesch. III. s. 734) says: "This prince was obliged to yield, in religious matters, to the prevailing depravity, but he did not lack good features of character which served to excite good hopes of him. There was a greater feeling of happiness under him than under his father, and there was great lamentation when he was obliged, at an early age, to go into captivity. Probably the touching psalms xlii., xliii., and lxxxiv. are from his hand." Vaihinger also (Herzog, Real-Encyc. VI. s. 787) agrees with this general opinion: "Although he had not reigned in the spirit of the Jehovah-religion, yet there continued to be among the people a longing for his return. The false prophets especially nourished this hope (Jerem. xxviii. 4)." These favorable opinions, however, are not at all well founded. From his sudden surrender of the city we may rather infer that he was weak and cowardly than anything else. [It should be noticed, however, that this is just what Jeremiah urged Zedekiah to do afterwards, viz., to yield to the Babylonians and sue for mercy (Jerem. xxxvii. 17 sq., cf. also xxxvii. 2). Jehoiachin, by surrendering, seems to have saved the city from sack and pillage and burning, which was its fate after Zedekiah's resistance. We cannot condemn Jehoiachin for pusillanimity in surrendering at discretion, and Zedekiah for obstinacy in resisting to the end. See next section. The surrender is as much a sign of wisdom as of weakness.—W. G. S.] There is no support in this text nor in Jeremiah for what Josephus adds in regard to the promise which had been given him and was broken. The words of the prophet (Jerem. xxii. 24–34), where he pronounces the divine oracle, come in here with peculiar significance: "As I live, saith the Lord, though Coniah [Jehoiachin], the son of Jehoiakim, king of Judah, were the signet upon my right hand, yet would I pluck thee thence! And I will give thee into the hand of them that seek thy life, and into the hand of them whose face thou fearest, even into the hand of Nebuchadrezzar, king of Babylon, and into the hand of the Chaldeans. And I will cast thee out, and thy mother that bare thee, into another country where ye were not born, and there shall ye die, but to the land whereunto they desire to return, thither shall they not return. Is [then, do ye ask] this man Coniah a despised, broken, idol? Is he a vessel wherein is no pleasure? Wherefore are they cast out, he, and his seed, and are cast into a land which they know not? O! earth, earth, earth, hear the word of the Lord. Thus saith the Lord: Write ye this man childless, a man that shall not prosper in his days, for no man of his seed shall prosper, sitting upon the throne of David, and ruling any more in Judah." This stern condemnation by Jehovah cannot rest upon any other foundation than the fact that Jehoiachin had done "that which was evil in the sight of the Lord, like to all that his father had done." It would have been a very unjust condemnation, if Jehoiachin had been "a man deserving of the highest respect," and if, by virtue of his good traits, he had been "superior to his brothers and his uncle," or had belonged to the better portion of the nation. The comparison to a signet ring, which has been so often interpreted to Jehoiachin's advantage, does not mean, if he were as dear to me as such a ring, nevertheless I would cast him away. Only those are dear to Jehovah who walk in His ways, and such he does not cast away. The meaning rather is, as is shown by the tearing off from the hand, this: however firmly he supposes that, as a king [of the House of David], he is held by me, even like the signet on my hand, nevertheless I will cast him away on account of his own sins and the sins of the people. When the false prophet Hananiah (Jerem. xxviii. 5 sq.) foretells that Jehovah will bring back all the vessels of the house of Jehovah, and king Jehoiachin, and all who are captive with him, and will break the yoke of the king of Babylon, this does not express any especial "longing" for the return of this king, but only a general desire for deliverance from the Babylonian yoke, and the restoration of the kingdom with its independent dynasty. On the other hand it is generally understood, and with far more apparent reason, that the "young lion," Ezek. xix. 5 sq., represents Jehoiachin, but this also is impossible, because all that is there implied in regard to him cannot possibly have taken place within three months (Schmiedler on that passage). In the abbreviated name Coniah (see the Exeg. notes on chap. xxiv. 8), which is there used, many old expositors, such as Grotius and Lightfoot, and also Hengstenberg and Schmiedler, have seen an intention to figure forth to the king his approaching doom: "The future is put first in order by cutting off the 'to cut off hope': a Jechoniah with J, a God-will-confirm without the "will" (Hengstenberg). Not to speak of any other objection to this, it is enough that the abbreviated form Coniah is used instead of Jechoniah not only in prophetic but also in historical passages (Jerem. xxxvii. 1), where there is no possible intention to signify the "cutting off of hope."

[Bähr seems to allow his judgment of Jehoiachin to be too much controlled by the standing formula that "he did that which was evil," &c. This formula covered many grades of evil, and no violence is done to the general justice of this verdict upon him, if we recognize the fact that he was not one of the worst among the bad. Ewald is justified in saying: "The king meant no harm, but he was negligent in his duties. He did not look forward to the future with good judgment. He was a tool of the nobles, and he was far too weak for the bitter crisis in which he was called to reign." Stanley also gives a fair estimate of the king and of the popular feeling in regard to him: "With straining eyes the Jewish people and prophets still hung on the hope that their lost prince would be speedily restored to them. The gate through which he left the city was walled up like that by which the last Moorish king left Grenada, and was long known as the gate of Jechoniah. From his captivity as from a decisive era the subsequent years of the history were reckoned (Ezek. i. 2; viii. 1; xxiv. 1; xxvi. 1; xxix. 1; xxxi. 1 [2 Kings xxv. 27]. The tidings were treasured up with a mournful pleasure, that, in the distant Babylon, where, with his royal mother (Jerem. xxii. 26; 2 Kings xxiv. 15), he was to end his days, after many years of imprisonment, the curse of childlessness, pronounced upon him by the prophet (Jerem. xxii. 30), was removed; and that, as he grew to man's estate, a race of no less than eight sons were born to him, by whom the royal race of Judah was carried on (1 Chron. iii. 17, 18; cf. Susan. i.-iv.); and yet more, that he had been kindly treated by the successor of his captor (2 Kings xxv. 27-30; Jerem. lii. 31-34); that he took precedence of all of the subject kings at the table of the Babylonian monarch; that his prison garments and his prison fare were changed to something like his former state. . . . More than one sacred legend—enshrined in the sacred books of many an ancient Christian Church—tells how he, with the other captives, sat on the banks of the Euphrates (Baruch i. 3, 4), and shed bitter tears as they heard the messages of their brethren in Palestine; or how he dwelt in a sumptuous house and fair gardens, with his beautiful wife, Susannah, 'more honorable than all others' (Susannah i.-iv.)."—W. G. S.]

5. The account of the eleven years' reign of Zedekiah only states how that reign came to an end, for besides the standing formula that he did evil in the sight of the Lord, it contains only the remark that he revolted from the king of Babylon. We obtain a more complete picture of this reign from the descriptions and historical accounts which are preserved in the book of Jeremiah, and also to some extent in the book of Ezekiel. As concerns his attitude towards Jehovah and the law of Moses, he does not seem to have been himself devoted to idolatry, but he did not oppose it any more than his brother Jehoiakim had done. On the contrary, heathenism and immorality rather increased and spread during his reign. The stone was rolling; it could not be stayed any more. The class whose especial duty it was to oppose this tendency, namely, the priests and prophets, sank during this time lower and lower (see Jerem. xxiii.). Then, too, the revolt of Zedekiah from Nebuchadnezzar was of a very different kind from that of Hozekiah from Sennacherib (see notes on chap. xviii. 7), nay, it was even worse than that of his brother Jehoiakim from Pharaoh-Necho, for he not only owed to Nebuchadnezzar his crown and his throne (as Jehoiakim had owed his to Pharaoh-Necho), but he had also sworn an oath of allegiance to him, as is expressly stated in the brief account, 2 Chron. xxxvi. 13. This oath he broke in a frivolous way without any sufficient reason. The prophet Ezekiel declares that this oath-breaking was a great sin, not only against him to whom it was sworn, but also against him by whom it was sworn, Jehovah, and he even gives this as the reason for the ruin of the king and of the nation (chap. xvii. 18-20): "Seeing he despised the oath by breaking the covenant, when lo! he had given his hand, and hath done all these things, he shall not escape. Therefore thus saith the Lord God, As I live, surely mine oath that he hath despised, and my covenant that he hath broken, even it will I recompense upon his own head. And I will spread my net upon him, and he shall be taken in my snare, and I will bring him to Babylon, and will plead with him there for his trespasses that he hath trespassed against me." He does not appear in a much better light according to some facts which Jeremiah mentions. During the siege of Jerusalem he entered into a solemn covenant with all the people "that every man should let his manservant, and every man his maid-servant, being a Hebrew or a Hebrewess, go free, that none should serve himself of them, to wit, of a Jew his brother." The "princes" and the "people" agreed to this and manumitted the serfs or slaves. But when it was heard that the Egyptian army was coming to help them, and they thought that they would not need the freed people any more, they broke the covenant and reduced them once more to slavery. This led the prophet to declare: "Therefore, thus saith the Lord: 'Ye have not hearkened unto me in proclaiming liberty every one to his brother, and every man to his neighbor: behold I proclaim a liberty for you, saith the Lord, to the sword, to the pestilence, and to the famine, and I will make you to be removed into all the kingdoms of the earth . . . And Zedekiah king of Judah and his princes will I give into the hand of their enemies, and into the hand of them that seek their life, and into the hand of the king of Babylon's army, which are gone up from you. Behold, I will command,' saith the Lord, 'and cause them to return to this city; and they shall fight against it and take it and burn it with fire, and I will make the cities of Judah a desolation without an inhabitant'" (Jerem. xxxiv. 8-22). What is narrated in Jerem. xxxvii. and xxxviii. is still more significant. At that time of great anxiety and distress the king sent messengers with this request: Pray for us to Jehovah! then, however, he allowed the officers to seize Jeremiah, maltreat him, and cast him into prison, because they were angry at his threats. Not until some time afterwards did he send for Jeremiah, though secretly, and ask of him an oracle of the Lord. Even yet he did not set him free, but only granted him a somewhat less severe imprisonment. Then, when the prophet repeatedly foretold the victory of the Chaldeans, the officers and chiefs demanded his death, and the king replied: "Behold he is in your hand; for the king is not he that can do anything against you." Then they lowered him into a dungeon in which there was no water, indeed, but slime, into which he sank, and where he would have perished wretchedly, if he had not been rescued through the efforts of an Ethiopian, Ebedmelech. Even yet, however, he was held as a prisoner. Still again the king sought a secret interview with him, but did not obey his counsel to give himself up, because he feared that he should be despised and maltreated by those Jews who had deserted to the Chaldeans. He commanded the prophet to keep the interview a secret, and especially not to let the "princes" know of it. When finally the Chaldeans penetrated into the lower city, he took flight by night with his immediate attendants from the opposite side of the city, but was soon caught by the Chaldeans, and brought before Nebuchadnezzar, who caused him to be blinded, and his sons to be put to death. From this entire story we see what was the chief feature in Zedekiah's character: "Weakness, and weakness of the saddest kind" (Niemeyer). Instead of ruling as king, he allows himself to be controlled by those who stand nearest to him; he cannot do anything against them. [Yet it would not be fair to overlook the fact that a powerful party of nobles, in a besieged city, where excitement and confusion and anxiety reigned, might make a strong king powerless to resist a policy on which they were determined. The party of the "princes" seems to have been possessed by that fanatical patriotism which not unfrequently takes possession of men under such circumstances, and drives them to heroic folly or foolish heroism. This passion appeared among the Jews in every crisis of their history. In this case it pushed the nation on to its fate, and though Zedekiah was a weak king, he might have been a strong one and not have been able to stem this tide.—W. G. S.] He has good inclinations, but he never attains to what is good. He demands an oracle of God but in secret, and, when he receives it, he does not obey it. His weakness of character makes him vacillating, false to his word and oath, unjust and pitiless, cowardly and despondent, and finally leads him into misery. We have here another example which shows that weakness and want of character are the very gravest faults, nay, even a vice, in a ruler. Josephus (Antiq. X. vii. 2) justly says of Zedekiah: τῶν δὲ δικαίων καὶ τοῦ δέοντος ὑπερόπτης, καὶ γὰρ οἱ κατὰ τὴν ἡλικίαν ἥσαν ἀσεβεῖς περὶ αὐτὸν, καὶ ὁ πᾶς ὄχλος ἐπ' ἐξουσίας ὑβρίζεν αὐτὸν ἐλε.

6. Zedekiah's end was the end of the royal house of David and of the Israelitish monarchy. This dynasty had remained on the throne for nearly 500 years, while, in the seceded kingdom of the ten tribes, within a period of 250 years, nine dynasties of nineteen kings reigned, of which each one dethroned and extirpated the preceding one. "What a wonder it is to see one dynasty endure through almost five entire centuries, and that too in the ancient times when dynasties usually had but brief duration, and to see this dynasty, in the midst of perils and changes, form a centre around which the nation always formed, so that when it perished at last, it perished only in the downfall of the nation itself. . . . Such a kingdom might fall into grievous error for a time, but in the long run it must be brought back by the example of its great hero and founder David, and by the wealth of experience which it had won in its undisturbed development, to the eternal fundamentals of all true religion, and all genuine life" (Ewald, Geach. III. s. 419). This "wonder," however, of the uninterrupted existence of the dynasty of David does not rest upon human will or power, but upon the promise which was given to David (2 Sam. vii. 8 sq.): "And thy house and thy kingdom shall be established forever before thee; thy throne shall be established forever" (ver. 16). The promise on which this promise was based was the idea that the Old Testament theocratic monarchy was realized in David. This monarchy is, as it were, realized in him, and he is not only the physical ancestor of his family, but the model for all his successors, according to their fidelity to which their reigns are estimated and judged (1 Kings xi. 38; xv. 3, 11; 2 Kings xiv. 3; xvi. 2; xviii. 3; xxii. 2). God sustains the monarchy in their hands for David's sake, even when they do not deserve it, for their own (1 Kings xi. 12; xiii. 32; xv. 4; 2 Kings viii. 19). When he went the way of all the earth he left as a bequest to his son the following words: "Be strong and show thyself a man, and keep the charge of the Lord thy God, to walk in his ways, to keep his statutes and his commandments, and his judgments, and his testimonies, as it is written in the law of Moses, that thou mayest prosper in all that thou doest, and whithersoever thou turnest thyself: That the Lord may continue his word which he spake concerning me, saying, If thy children take heed to their way, to walk before me in truth, with all their heart and with all their soul, there shall not fail thee, said he, a man on the throne of Israel" (1 Kings ii. 2-4). When, however, after Josiah's death, four kings in succession abandoned the way of David, and apostasy became a fixed and permanent tradition, the monarchy ceased to be what it was its calling and purpose to be; it was necessarily doomed to perish. "When the traditions of evil are maintained, or at least tolerated, then the monarchy suffers a transformation. Kings become incapable of executing the duties of their office, and a divine judgment becomes inevitable. So it was with the sons of Josiah, whose fate is a warning beacon on the horizon of history" (Vilmar). But, in spite of the inevitable doom of the nation, the promise to David was fulfilled in its integrity. Although the external authority of the house of David ceased with Zedekiah, yet from the time of his fall the preparation went on, all the more surely, for the coming of that Son of David who was to be a king over the house of David forever, and whose kingdom should have no end (Luke i. 33). The place of the light of the house of David, which had been extinguished (1 Kings xi. 36; 2 Kings viii. 19), was taken, when the time was fulfilled, by the true light which illumines the whole world (John i. 9), and which will not be extinguished to all eternity. The last king who sat upon the throne of David, and who falsely called himself אֱלֹהֵי יְהוָה [The righteousness of God], served to point forward, in the Providence of God, and according to the words of the prophet, to the coming king and shepherd of his people, whose name should be called: יְהוָה יִצְחָק, "The Lord our Righteousness" (Jerem. xxiii. 6).

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

See the above paragraphs and compare the additional information afforded by the passages above quoted from Jeremiah.

Chap. xxiii. 31.-xxv. 7. The Four Last Kings of Judah. (a) The way in which they all walked. (They all abandoned the living God and His law, though they had the best model and example in their ancestor. They did not listen to the warnings and exhortations of the prophets, but followed their own lusts. Instead of being good shepherds of their people, they led them into deeper and deeper corruption.) (b) The end to which they all came. (They all learned what misery comes of abandoning the Lord, Jerem. ii. 19. Two of them reigned for only three months each; their glory was like the grass, which in the morning groweth up, but in the evening is cut down, dried up, and withered. One of them was forced to go to Egypt, where he died, and another to go to Babylon, where he remained a captive for thirty-seven years. Two of them died miserably: one was dragged to death and his corpse was thrown out like that of a dead animal; the other was forced to see his sons slain before his eyes, then he was blinded and ended his days in a prison. The godless, even though they be princes, perish utterly, Pa. lxxiii. 19. The judgments of God are true and righteous, Rev. xvi. 7; Pa. cxlv. 17.)—KYBURZ: We are surprised that Jehoiakim did not take warning by Jehoahaz, and that Jehoiachin and Zedekiah did not take warning by Jehoiakim, but that all made themselves abominable to God by the same sin; but how many great families and races have we seen since then come to a fearful end, without taking warning by their fate. On the contrary, we have made ourselves guilty in his sight with the same or greater sins.—A dynasty in which apostasy has become hereditary and traditional has no blessing or happiness; it must sooner or later perish. The words of Pa. lxxxix. 14: "Justice and judgment are the habitation of thy throne," apply also to an earthly throne. A throne or a government which lacks this "habitation" [more correctly, stronghold] has no sure foundation. It rocks and reels and finally falls. This is shown by the history of these four kings, all of whom departed from righteousness and the law of God, and were guided in their rule only by political considerations. They became the sport of ambitious conquerors.—There can be no greater disgrace or humiliation for a country than that foreigners should set up or depose rulers for it according to their whim.

Chap. xxiii. 31 sq. The son's want of loyalty to the law of God tore down in three months what the father's zeal had built up by thirty-one years of anxious labor. How often a son squanders in a short time what a father has collected by years of careful toil.—What a responsibility falls upon the ruler who opens the door again for the return of the evils which a former government has earnestly labored to shut out.—Ver. 34. Two brothers stand in hostile relations to each other. One deposes the other. They are both sons of the same pious father, but they resemble him in nothing.—Jehoiakim and Zedekiah each receive a new name when they ascend the throne. What is the use, however, of changing the name when the character is not changed, or of taking on a name to which the life does not correspond?—A throne which is bought with money won by exactions is an abomination in the sight of God. Jehoiakim does not contribute anything from his own treasures, but exacts all from his subjects. He builds great houses and lives in abundance and luxury, but does not give to the laborers the wages which they have so well earned. This is the way of tyrants, but they receive their reward from him who recompenses each according to his works (Jerem. xxii. 15-19). Avarice is the root of evil, even among the great and rich; it brings them into temptation, 1 Tim. vi. 9.—Chap. xxiv. 1. To-day the mighty king of Egypt makes Jehoiakim his vassal, to-morrow the still more mighty king of Babylon; such is the fate of princes who put their trust in an arm of flesh, and turn away from the Lord instead of calling after him: "He is my refuge and my fortress, my God, in him will I trust" (Pa. xci. 2).—Ver. 2. WTR. SUMM.: It is not a mere chance when an armed enemy invades a country; they are sent by God, without whom not one could set a foot therein. It is a punishment for sin. Therefore let no man take courage in sin because there is profound peace. Peace is never so firm that God cannot put an end to it and send war.—He revolted. He who cannot bend under the mighty hand of God will not submit to the human powers in subjection to which he has been placed by God. Resistance, however, is vain, for God resisteth the proud.—KYBURZ: Hear, ye kings and judges of the earth! God demands that ye shall humble yourselves before His messengers. David did this before Nathan. Do not think that your majesty is thereby diminished; God can exalt again those who humble themselves before him. But, if ye do not do this, God will do to you as he did to Jehoiakim and Zedekiah.—The word of the Lord, which He spake to Jehoiakim by His prophet, the king threw into the fire and thought that he had thus reduced it to naught (Jerem. xxxvi. 23), but he was brought to the bitter experience that the word of the Lord cannot be burned up, but is, and remains to all eternity, true and sure.—Vers. 3, 4. The sin of Manasseh was not visited on his descendants in such a way that they could say: "The fathers have eaten sour grapes and the children's teeth are set on edge" (Jerem. xxxi. 29), for "The son shall not bear the iniquity of the father" (Ezek. xviii. 20), but the punishment fell upon Judah because it had made itself a participant in the crime of Manasseh, and, like him, had shed innocent blood (Jerem. xxvi. 20-23; see also Ezek. xxxiii. 25 sq.).—Ver. 7. Easy won, easy lost. This has always been the fortune of conquerors. What one has won by robbery and force another mightier takes from him. The Lord in heaven makes the great small, and the rich poor (1 Sam. ii. 7; Pa. lxxv. 7).

Vers. 8-16. OSIAENDER: As long as the people of God does not truly repent it has little cause to rejoice that one or another tyrant is removed, for a worse one may follow.—"Wheresoever the carcass is, there will the eagles be gathered together" (Matt. xxiv. 28). A nation which is in decay attracts the conquerors, who do not quit it until it is torn to pieces.—STARKE: There is always misery and danger where there is war, therefore let us pray to be preserved from war and bloodshed.—Ver. 12. Instead of calling upon God, Jehoiachin surrenders himself at once and asks for mercy. He who does not trust in God soon falls into despondency. Delirant reges, plectuntur Achivi.—

Vers. 14-16. Notice God's mercy and long-suffering even in his judgments. He still allows the kingdom to stand, and turns the heart of the enemy so that he does not yet make an utter end of it (Ezek. xviii. 23, 32; see notes on chap. xxv. 21).

Chap. xxiv. 17 to xxv. 7. Zedekiah, the last king on David's throne. See Historical § 5. ROOS: Zedekiah is an example of a man who, in spite of some good traits, finally perishes because he never can attain to victory over the world and over sin. He listened unmoved to Jerem. xxvii. 12 sq. and xxiv. 2 sq. He made an agreement with the people to keep a year of manumission (Jerem. xxxiv. 8). He desired that Jeremiah should pray to the Lord for him and for his people (chap. xxxvii. 3). He rescued Jeremiah from a fearful dungeon into which he had been cast without the king's authority, asked of him secretly a divine oracle, and caused him to be brought into an endurable prison (chap. xxxvii. 17 sq.). He saved him once more from a terrible prison and asked once more privately for the divine oracle (chap. xxxviii). Yet in the midst of all this he remained a slave of sin. He asked and listened, but did not obey. His purposes had no endurance or energy. He was a king whom his nobles had succeeded in overpowering. He feared them more than God. He had no courage to trust God's word and he feared where there was no reason (chap. xxxviii. 19 sq.). On the other hand he allowed himself to be persuaded by his counsellors and nobles (chap. xxxviii. 22). He hoped for miracles such as had been performed in early times, particularly in the time of Hezekiah (chap. xxi. 2), although he had no promises of God to serve as a ground for such hopes. He trusted in the strength of the fortification of Jerusalem (chap. xxi. 13), and did not believe what Jeremiah foretold in regard to the destruction of this city.—Chap. xxiv. 20. Zedekiah broke his oath for the sake of earthly gain and honor. Be not deceived, God will not be mocked. He who calls upon God and then fails of his word mocks at Him who can ruin soul and body in hell. All the misery and woe which befell Zedekiah came from his perjury (Ezek. xvii. 18 sq.). PFAFF: We must keep faith even with unbelievers and enemies (Josh. ix. 19).—A prince who breaks his own oath cannot complain when his subjects break their oath of allegiance to him.—Chap. xxv. 1 sq. STARKE: When the rod does not avail, God sends the sword (Ezek. xxi. 13 and 14).—Ver. 3. CRAMER: God often punishes loathing of His word by physical hunger (Lament. iv. 10).—Vers. 4-6. WÜRT. SUMM.: When God means to punish a sinner no wall or weapon avails to protect him (Jerem. xli. 6).—STARKE: If we will not take that road to escape which God has given us we cannot escape at all (Hos. xiii. 19; Jerem. ii. 17).—Ver. 7. STARKE: Many parents, by their godless behavior, bring their children into temporal and eternal ruin. Such children will some day have just cause to cry out against their parents (Sir. xli. 10).—A punishment which is deserved must be inflicted upon the just condemnation of the proper authority, but even the mightiest earthly power has no right to torture a convict. The civil authority is indeed an avenger to punish the guilty, and it does not carry the sword in vain, but it ceases to be God's servant when it becomes bloodthirsty and delights in pain.

B.—Fall of the Kingdom of Judah; Jehoiachin set at Liberty.

CHAP. XXV. 8-30. (JEREM. LIII. 12-34.)

- 8 AND in the fifth month, on the seventh day of the month, which is the nineteenth year of king Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon, came Nebuzar-adan, captain of the guard, a servant of the king of Babylon, unto Jerusalem: And he burnt the house of the Lord, and the king's house, and all the houses of Jerusalem, and every great man's [one man's'] house burnt he with fire.
- 10 And all the army of the Chaldees, that were with the captain of the guard, brake down the walls of Jerusalem round about. Now the rest of the people that were left in the city, and the fugitives that fell away to the king of Babylon, with the remnant of the multitude, did Nebuzar-adan the captain of the guard carry away. But the captain of the guard left of the poor of the land to be [read to be] vinedressers and husbandmen. And the pillars of brass that were in the house of the Lord, and the bases, and the brazen sea that was in the house of the Lord, did the Chaldees break in pieces, and carried the brass of them to Babylon. And the pots, and the shovels, and the snuffers, and the spoons, and all the vessels of brass wherewith they ministered [the service was performed], took they away. And the firepans, and the bowls [sprinklers], and such things as were of gold, in gold, and of silver, in silver, the captain of the guard took away. The two pillars, one sea, and the bases which Solomon had made for the house of the Lord; the brass of all these vessels was without weight. The height of the one pillar was eighteen cubits, and the chapter [capital] upon it was brass; and the height of the chapter three cubits; and the wreathen work, and pomegranates upon the chapter round about, all of brass: and like unto these had the second pillar with wreathen work.

- 18 And the captain of the guard took Seraiah the chief priest, and Zephaniah 19 the second priest, and the three keepers of the door: And out of the city he took an officer that was set over the men of war, and five men of them that were in the king's presence, which were found in the city, and the principal [omit principal] scribe of the [captain of the] host, which mustered the people of the land, and threescore men of the people of the land that were found in the 20 city: And Nebuzar-adan captain of the guard took these, and brought them to 21 the king of Babylon to Riblah: And the king of Babylon smote them, and slew them at Riblah in the land of Hamath. So Judah was carried away out of their 22 land. And as for the people that remained in the land of Judah, whom Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon had left, even over them he made Gedaliah the son of 23 Ahikam, the son of Shaphan, ruler. And when all the captains of the armies, they and their [the] men, heard that the king of Babylon had made Gedaliah governor, there came to Gedaliah to Mizpah, even Ishmael the son of Netha-niah, and Johanan the son of Careah, and Seraiah the son of Tanhumeth the Netophathite, and Jaazaniah the son of a Maachathite, they and their men.
 24 And Gedaliah sware to them, and to their men, and said unto them, Fear not to be [omit to be] the servants of the Chaldees: dwell in the land, and serve the 25 king of Babylon; and it shall be well with you. But it came to pass in the seventh month, that Ishmael the son of Nethaniah, the son of Elishama, of the seed royal, came, and ten men with him, and smote Gedaliah, that he died [and put him to death], and the Jews and the Chaldees that were with him at Miz-26 pah. And all the people, both small and great, and the captains of the armies, arose, and came to Egypt: for they were afraid of the Chaldees.
 27 And it came to pass in the seven and thirtieth year of the captivity of Je-hoiachin king of Judah, in the twelfth month, on the seven and twentieth day of the month, that Evil-merodach king of Babylon in the year that he began to 28 reign did lift up the head of Jehoiachin king of Judah out of prison; And he spake kindly to him, and set his throne above the throne of the kings that were 29 with him in Babylon; [.] And [he] changed his prison garments: and he did eat bread continually before him [in his presence, i. e., at his table] all the days 30 of his life. And his allowance was a continual allowance given him of the king, a daily rate for every day, all the days of his life.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

* Ver. 9. בֵּית גָּדֹל. The translators took the stat. const. to mean house of a great (sc. man). It is a case, however, of an adjective bound somewhat more closely to its substantive by the stat. const. = every great house, mansion.
 הָיָל כְּבֹד, chap. xviii. 17. Ew. § 287, 1.

* Ver. 10. ["After אֲשֶׁר we must supply אֶת from Jerem. lli. 14." Ew. Lehrb. s. 737, ut 1.—W. G. S.]

* Ver. 12. For the chetiv וְלִנְיָם the keri presents וְלִנְיָם as in Jerem. lli. 16. The signification is the same.—
 Bähr.

CHRONOLOGY OF THE PERIOD FROM THE FALL OF THE KINGDOM OF ISRAEL TO THE FALL OF THE KINGDOM OF JUDAH.

Although the chronology of this period presents far fewer difficulties than that of the two former ones (pp. 86 and 180), yet a certain transmutation of its data into dates of the Christian era is hardly possible, for this reason, that the number of years stated as the duration of each reign does not always represent so many complete twelvemonths, and, of course, the years intended are not years of the Christian era, so that one year of a reign may fall in two different years "before Christ," and two years of these reigns may fall in one year B. C. We cannot, therefore, avoid some uncertainties in the transfer from one to the other of these two modes of reckoning, and a difference of a single year cannot demand an explanation, or vitiate the calculation.

(a) Let us start from the fixed date which we have reached above (p. 181), 721 B. C., the year of the fall of Samaria. As this was the sixth year of Hezekiah, who reigned twenty-nine years (2 Kings xviii. 10), there remain twenty-three years of his reign to be reckoned into this period. This gives us the following results:—

	Reigned for
Hezekiah	23 years	longer,	i. e. ,	until 698.
Manasseh	55 "	(chap. xxi. 1)	"	" 643.
Amon	2 "	(chap. xxi. 19)	"	" 641.
Josiah	31 "	(chap. xxii. 1)	"	" 610.
Jehoahaz	3 mos.	(chap. xxiii. 31)
Jehoiakim	11 yrs.	(chap. xxiii. 36)	"	" 599.
Jehoiachin	3 mos.	(chap. xxiv. 8)
Zedekiah	11 yrs.	(chap. xxiv. 18)	"	" 588.

The Book of Chronicles agrees exactly in all these dates. There is no variant in regard to a single one of them; the old versions have them exactly as they are given in the Hebrew text, and Josephus also gives the same. We are, therefore, as sure of these numbers as of any. Some modern scholars have taken scruples at the long reign of fifty-five years which is ascribed to Manasseh, and have shortened it arbitrarily either to thirty-five years (Movers, Von Gumpach), or to forty-five years (Bunsen, Wolff). This change, however, is inadmissible, for it necessitates other changes and throws the whole chronology into confusion. [This change is made in the interest of what is known as the "shorter period" for the space of history which is here included. The grounds for it are found in the Assyrian, Babylonian, and Egyptian chronologies. The problem is very complex, and the solution of it is hampered at many points by the uncertainty of many of the data. The majority of scholars have not, therefore, thought it wise to make any changes in the Hebrew chronology, to bring it into accord with that of contemporary nations, until the latter shall be more satisfactorily determined. Those who desire to attempt, even now, to bring about an accord, find it necessary to shorten the time which is required by the sum of the reigns for this period, and they see in the long reign ascribed to Manasseh the point where the error is most likely to lie.—W. G. S.] The time for which the kingdom of Judah outlasted the kingdom of Israel amounts to 133 years. The six months for which Jehoahaz and Jehoiachin reigned are here left out of the account, and with justice, for it can hardly be that the years ascribed to the other reigns were all full twelvemonths. It is immaterial whether each three months' reign is reckoned into the preceding or the following reign. It is possible that Zedekiah did not ascend the throne until 598, so that he reigned until 587, but in no case can his dethronement be placed later than 587. Instead of the year 588, in which, according to our reckoning, the fall of Jerusalem took place, many have lately adopted 586 as the date of that event. Bunsen, starting from the very uncertain Assyrio-Egyptian chronology, puts the fall of Samaria in 709 instead of in 721. He would be obliged, if he admitted 133 years for the subsequent duration of the kingdom of Judah, to put the fall of Jerusalem in 576, but, as he sees that this is inadmissible, he arbitrarily cuts off ten years from the reign of Manasseh and thus reaches the date 586. Kwald also adopts the date 586, but he reaches it by putting the fall of Samaria in 719 instead of in 721. This obliges him to set the date of accession of each of the following kings two years later than our dates, and thus he arrives at 586 instead of 588. We saw above (p. 181) that the date 719 is incorrect; with the incorrectness of this date, the date 586 falls to the ground. If, as we have seen, the date 721 is certainly established, then 588 is the only date which can be correct for the fall of Jerusalem, for, even if we suppose that all the years of all the reigns were full years, they only amount to 133 years.

(b) Besides the statements as to the duration of these reigns, we have the following chronological data in regard to them: (1) The thirteenth year of Josiah is given as the year in which Jeremiah first appeared as a prophet (Jerem. i. 1). This was the year 628, for Josiah began to reign in 641. Also the eighteenth year of Josiah is mentioned as the year of his reformation and celebration of the passover—that is, 623 (2 Kings xxii. 3; xxiii. 23). As Josiah was slain in his battle with Necho, the invasion of Asia by the latter took place in Josiah's thirty-first year, that is, in 610. The invasion of Judah by the Scythians, which is not mentioned at all in the historical books, must have taken place during the reign of Josiah, not before the public appearance of Jeremiah (628), and not after the great reformation (623). Duncker sets it in the fourteenth year of Josiah's reign, that is, 627. [See the Supp. Note, p. 285.]—(2) King Jehoiakim ascended the throne either at the very end of 610, or perhaps in 609, for Jehoahaz reigned for three months after Josiah's death. According to Jerem. xli. 2, the great battle at Carchemish, in consequence of which Nebuchadnezzar advanced into Palestine, took place in the fourth year of Jehoiakim, that is, in 605 or 604 (see notes on chap. xxiii. 36). In this same fourth year of Jehoiakim, Jeremiah caused to be written down his prophecies, which were solemnly read in public in the following year, on a great holiday (Jerem. xxxvi. 1, 9). Up to this time, therefore, Jehoiakim was not yet subject to Nebuchadnezzar; he cannot have become so until the end of 605 or the beginning of 604. He revolted after three years (2 Kings xxiv. 1), that is, in 602 or 601. Chaldean and other forces harassed him from that time until his death in 599 (2 Kings xxiv. 2 sq.).—(3) As Jehoiachin only reigned three months, it may well be that Zedekiah ascended the throne before the end of the year (599) in which Jehoiakim died. His fourth year, in which, according to Jerem. li. 59, he made a journey to Babylon, was, therefore, 595; certainly it was not 593, as Duncker and Ewald state, for, if he had not become king until the beginning of 598, this journey would fall, at the latest, in 594. In his ninth year, 590, the Chaldeans appeared before Jerusalem (chap. xxv. 1). In his tenth year (589), while the city was being besieged, he ordered Jeremiah to be imprisoned (Jerem. xxxii. 1). In his eleventh year (588), Jerusalem was taken, and Zedekiah was blinded and taken away captive to Babylon. In this same year occurred the destruction of the temple and of the city (2 Kings xxv. 4, 8).

(c) Several synchronisms are given between the reigns of the Jewish kings and that of Nebuchadnezzar. According to Jerem. xxv. 1, the first year of Nebuchadnezzar was the fourth of Jehoiakim (606), that is (see above), the year of the battle of Carchemish (Jerem. xli. 2). This first year of Nebuchadnezzar and fourth of Jehoiakim was also, according to Jerem. xxv. 1-3, the twenty-third year of Jeremiah's work as prophet, which began (Jerem. i. 2) in the thirteenth year of Josiah (628). According to 2 Kings xxiv. 12, Nebuchadnezzar took Jehoiachin prisoner in his own eighth year, that is, in 599, in which year, as we have seen above, the three months' reign of Jehoiachin fell. Nebuchadnezzar's eighteenth year corresponds, according to Jerem. xxxii. 1, to the tenth year of Zedekiah, that is, since Zedekiah became king in 599, 589, and his nineteenth year, in which he took Jerusalem (2 Kings xxv. 8; Jerem. lli. 2), corresponds to the eleventh year of Zedekiah (2 Kings xxv. 2). This is the year 588. In Jerem. lli. 28 sq., the seventh year is given instead of the eighth, and the eighteenth instead of the nineteenth of Nebuchadnezzar, but we shall see below, in the appendix to the Exegetical notes, that this difference, which only amounts at best to one year, is only apparent and not real. It cannot invalidate the calculation. The last chronological statement which occurs in the book is that, in the thirty-seventh year of Jehoiachin's captivity, Evil-Merodach, Nebuchadnezzar's successor, released Jehoiachin from his prison in Babylon (chap. xxv. 27; Jerem. lii. 31). As the exile took place in the year 599 (see above under a), the liberation must have occurred in 562. According to Josephus (Antiq. x. 11, 1) Nebuchadnezzar reigned for forty-three years. We have seen above that he became king in 606; his death, therefore, took place in 562. In this year Evil-Merodach followed him, and, on his accession, he showed grace to Jehoiachin.

Thus the chronological statements in reference to this period which are presented by the Bible stand in the fullest accord with each other, and we have the more reason to hold to them, inasmuch as they are consistent with those of the former period. It is not our duty to inquire whether they agree with the results of the Assyrian and Egyptian investigations. We need only remark that these results are based, partly upon later unbiblical authors, and partly on attempts to decipher old Asiatic inscriptions, which have as yet produced no certain results, so that, as Röscher says: "They are not yet by any means so firmly established that they could force us to surrender the data of the Old Testament." [See the Appendix on the Chronology.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 8. And in the fifth month, on the seventh day. Instead of the seventh day, Jerem. lii. 12 gives the tenth day. As the tenth day was the day on which Nebuchadnezzar came to Jerusalem, according to that passage, it is impossible to assume, with the Rabbis, that the seventh day was the day that the burning commenced, and the tenth the day on which it ended. Also in ver. 17 Jeremiah has five cubits instead of three, and in ver. 19 seven men instead of five. The difference in these numbers is to be explained by a mistake in the numeral-letters. In ver. 17 the number five is unquestionably correct (cf. 1 Kings vii. 16; 2 Chron. iii. 15), and in this verse the number ten (י) no doubt is to be preferred to seven (ז). In fact, the text of Jeremiah is in many respects to be preferred. Josephus (Bella Jud. 6, 4, 8) states that Herod's temple was burned on the tenth of the fifth month, and adds that it was a marvellous coincidence that the first temple was burned on the same day by the Babylonians.—The nineteenth year of king Nebuchadnezzar. See the Chronological section above.—Nebuzar-adan. On the etymology and signification of this name see Gesenius, Thesaurus II., p. 839, and Fürst, H.-W.-B. II., s. 6. [The former interprets it by Mercurius dux dominus, i. e., dux cui Mercurius faveat], the latter considers it equivalent to the Hebrew expression which immediately follows: יְרֵמְיָהּ (יְרֵמְיָהּ), i. e., literally: The captain of the executioners, the one who commands those who are commissioned to execute the king's commands, especially his death-sentences, and so, in general, the captain of the [royal] guard (Gen. xxxvii. 36). ["It is probably a Hebrew corruption of Nebu-zir-iddin, which means Nebo-has-given-offspring"] (Rawlinson). This is the only explanation which has any value, since it alone rests on an etymological study of Chaldean names.—W. G. S.] The supplementary description in Jerem. lii. 12: "Who stood before the king of Babylon," designates him as the first and highest officer who stood nearest to the king. He therefore remained in the camp at Riblah with the king, and only went to Jerusalem for the execution, and not, as Thenius thinks, in order to bring the siege to a conclusion. [It is laying too much stress on the primary signification of the word, which, moreover, is incorrect, to suppose that he did not go up to the city until it had been taken, and that then his business was to "execute" upon it the vengeance or punishment ordained by the king. He went up as the chief officer of the king "to bring the siege to a conclusion," to take possession of the city in the king's name, and to carry out the king's determinations in regard to it.—W. G. S.]

Ver. 9. And he burnt the house of the Lord, &c. We see what is meant by בְּלִבְתֵּי, all the houses, from 2 Chron. xxxvi. 19, where we read: בְּלִבְתֵּי הַמִּלְכִּים, all the palaces. He left the small houses standing for the poor and humble people who were left behind.—In Jer. lii. 14 we find בְּלִבְתֵּי before חֹמֹת in ver. 10. It has been omitted here by some accident, or because it was regarded as a matter of course; it is by no means "an arbitrary exaggeration" (Thenius). On the other hand we must supply אֶת before רַב on the authority of the passage in Jeremiah. Many old MSS. contain it, and all the versions supply it. Nebuzar-adan directed the work of destruction; the entire army fulfilled his commands.—The exiles were composed, as the repetition of וְאֵת shows, of "remnants" (יְתֵר) of two classes; first, of those whom famine, pestilence, and sword had yet spared, and those who had deserted to the Chaldeans; and, secondly, of הַרְבֵּה, or, as we read in Jerem. lii. 15 הָאֶמְקָן, which Hitzig declares to be the original reading, and to mean master-workman in a collective sense, comprising both the classes which are mentioned in Jerem. xxiv. 1. The parallel passage, however, in Jerem. xxxix. 9 does not admit of this interpretation, for there we read: יְתֵר הָעָם הַנִּשְׁאָרִים. יְתֵר הָעָם is not a synonym of הָאֶמְקָן (master-workman), but of הַרְבֵּה (multitude). This latter word is used for the mass of the people, and especially for the multitude of persons capable of bearing arms (Isai. xiii. 4; xxxiii. 3; Judges iv. 7; Dan. xi. 11). We must understand this class of exiles to be the remainder of the able-bodied male population who were capable of bearing arms (Thenius). In הָאֶמְקָן, א is an error for ה. The one class were inhabitants of the city; the other were persons who had belonged to the army without being inhabitants of the city.—וְלֵית הָאֶרֶץ, ver. 12, is used as in chap. xxiv. 14. The words do not mean that he left vinedressers and husbandmen, but, as is stated in Jerem. xxxix. 10, that he "left of the poor of the people, which had nothing, in the land of Judah, and gave them vineyards and fields at the same time." The Chaldee version has it, "that they might cultivate vineyards and fields." The land was not to remain desert and uncultivated.

Ver. 13. And the pillars of brass, &c. In regard to these pillars, and the bases, and the sea, see notes on 1 Kings vii. 15-39. The מְרִיקָה

(sprinklers), mentioned in Jerem. lii. 18, are not named among the utensils enumerated in ver. 14 (for description of which see notes on 1 Kings vii. 40, 50); they are mentioned in ver. 15. In ver. 15 we have the utensils of the forecourt, and in ver. 15 those of the sanctuary. It is expressly stated in Jerem. xxvii. 19, 21 that there remained after the first spoliation, chap. xxiv. 13, a portion of these utensils which may have been hidden away at that time. The parallel passage, Jerem. lii. 19, adds four more to the utensils which are mentioned in ver. 15. In general the account here is brief, and all articles not mentioned are summarily disposed of by the words: "such things as were of gold, in gold, and such things as were of silver, in silver," i. e., "so much as there was to be found of either kind" (Thenius).

—לֹחַ is not to be supplied in ver. 16 from ver. 15, and הַעֲמֻדִים, &c., are not the objects of this verb. The verse means to show that there was such a mass of the brass which was carried away that it could not be weighed. הַעֲמֻדִים is a nominative absolute. As for the pillars, &c., the mass of the brass was so great, &c. אֶחָד with הַעֲמֻדִים stands in contrast to שְׁנַיִם with הַיָּם.

There were two of the pillars but only one sea.—In ver. 17 the author recurs to the pillars in order to say that they were very valuable, not only on account of the mass of the brass which was on them (ver. 16), but also on account of the artistic labor which had been spent upon them. שָׁלֵשׁ, as has been said above, is an error, the consequence of mistaking the numeral character, for the height of the capital of the column, according to the consistent statements in 1 Kings vii. 16; 2 Chron. iii. 15; and Jerem. lii. 22 was five cubits.

עַל-הַיִּבֵּכָה, at the end of the verse, is difficult, for the second column was in all respects, and not simply in respect to the "wreathen work," like to the first. Moreover, the wreathen work was not the most remarkable feature in these columns, so as to deserve to be especially mentioned. Thenius sees in the clause "the residuum of a sentence which is given in full in Jeremiah" [lii. 23], and which closes with the words עַל-הַיִּבֵּכָה כָּבִיב.

We must admit either that the original account [which was used by the author of "Kings"] was here too much abbreviated by him, or else that the text at this point is defective. The account in Jeremiah is, at this point, fuller and more satisfactory. As this author had already given a full description of these things in 1 Kings vii. 15-22, he did not think it necessary to go into detail here.

Ver. 18. And the captain of the guard took

Seraiah. The persons who are mentioned here and in ver. 19 are not the same ones who are called, in Jerem. xxxix. 6, הָרִים, and who were put to death with the sons of Zedekiah, for these were first captured by Nebuzar-adan after the taking of the city. Seraiah is not the person of that name who is mentioned in Jerem. li. 59, but the grandfather or great-grandfather of Ezra (see Ezra vii. 1; 1 Chron. v. 40). Zephaniah was no doubt the son of the priest Maaseiah, who, although a priest of the second rank (see notes on chap. xxiii. 4), appears to have been a person of importance (Jerem. xxi. 2; xxix. 25, 29; xxxvii. 3). The three keepers of the door were the chiefs of the body of levites who guarded the temple; one was stationed at each of the three main entrances to the temple (Jerem. xxxviii. 14); according to Josephus: τοὶ φυλάσσοντες τὸν ἱερὸν ἡγούμενας. The chief royal officers were also taken, together with these chief men in the personnel of the temple (ver. 19). קָרַי stands in contrast with the temple; whether it has the narrower meaning of the "City of David" (Thenius), is uncertain. כָּרִים cannot mean a cumuch here, any more than in chap. xx. 18, and xxiv. 12. The command of soldiers would never be intrusted to such a person. Jerem. lii. 25 has הָרִיחַ instead of הָרִיחַ, evidently more correctly, for he was so no longer. We cannot tell whether five men of those who belonged to the king's immediate circle were carried away, as is here stated, or seven, as is stated in Jerem. lii. 25. The diverse statements are the result of some error in reading or copying the numerals. Hitzig: "Seven persons are mentioned as having been chosen to be a sacrifice on account of the mystical significance of that number," but the number five, half of ten, which was the number for a complete whole incorporated of parts, may also have had mystical significance. The reason why just this number, whether five or seven, were taken appears to be given in the relative clause which follows, and that is that there were just so many left in the city. יֶשֶׁר הַצָּבָא is a genitive after הַסֹּפֵר [the scribe of the captain of the host], and הַמַּעֲבָדָה is not to be joined with יֶשֶׁר

but with הַסֹּפֵר [the scribe who was put on the staff of the commander-in-chief, and whose duty it was to enroll the persons liable to military service,

&c.] The article with כָּתָב (it is wanting in Jerem.

lii. 25) shows that that is not a proper name in apposition with "Captain of the host," as the Vulg. and Luther understand it: "Sophor, the commander of the army." It means the general's clerk, the officer who had charge of the writing which might be required. "Perhaps the commander himself had fled with the king" (Thenius). [Of course any one who filled this office at a time when writing was a special accomplishment would be a person of far more importance than a military clerk now is. The Babylonian king thought him an officer whom it was worth while to put to death among the high officials of the kingdom.—] The threescore men of the people of the land, who were put to death with the chief officers, were either "the chiefs of the rebellion with their immediate followers" (Von Gerlach), or "Such as had in some way distinguished themselves above others in the defence of the city" (Keil). It is very doubtful whether they were, as Thenius thinks, the handful that were left of the garrison of the city of David, and the opinion of Hitzig and Bertheau that they were the country people who had fled into the citadel is very improbable.—Ver. 21. So Judah was carried out of their land. "Nebuzar-adan took up his march toward Riblah, not only with these who were destined to death, but also with all the people of Judah" (Hitzig). This sentence evidently closes the history, like Jerem. lii. 27, and chap. xvii. 23. At the same time it forms the introduction to what follows. Thus was Judah (that is, the mass and strength of the nation) led away into captivity. As for those who were left behind (the comparatively small, and poor, and weak portion), Nebuchadnezzar set Gedaliah over them.

Ver. 22. And as for the people that remained in the land of Judah. What is here narrated in vers. 22 to 28 is omitted in Jerem. lii. because it is narrated, in that book, in chaps. xl. and xli., and in much fuller detail. The verses before us form only an extract from that account, which is here inserted in its proper historical connection.—Gedaliah, whom Nebuchadnezzar appointed governor, was the son of Ahikam, who is mentioned in chap. xxii. 12 as a man of importance under Josiah, and who, according to Jerem. xxvi. 24, saved the life of the prophet when, during Jehoiakim's reign, he was in danger of falling a victim of popular rage. Gedaliah, like his father, was a friend of the prophet. He shared the prophet's judgment in regard to the wise policy to be pursued, and joined with him in advising Zedekiah to surrender to the Babylonians (Jerem. xxxviii. 17). Hence Nebuchadnezzar, after he had taken the city, intrusted to the prophet, who until then had lain in captivity, to the care and protection of Gedaliah (Jerem. xxxix. 14; xl. 6).—The captains of the armies, they and the men, &c. Instead of הַנְּשִׂימִים we find in Jerem. xl. 7: הַנְּשִׂימִים, their men. These are they "who were scattered when the king was captured, so that Jerem. xl. 7 describes them as those 'which were in the fields'" (Thenius). Mizpah was a city in the territory of Benjamin (Josh. xiii. 26), some hours' journey north-west of Jerusalem. Here, in this city, which was situated in a high position and strongly fortified (1 Kings xv. 22), the governor established himself, as he could not live in the destroyed city of Jerusalem. Ishmael, according to ver. 25, was the grandson of Elishama, the כֹּהֵן of king Jehoiakim (Jerem. xxxvi. 12, 20). For further particulars in regard to Johanan see Jerem. xl. 13 sq.; xli. 11 sq. Jonathan is mentioned with him, Jerem. xl. 8, as another son of Careah. Possibly the similarity of the names caused the latter to be omitted in this place. Seraiah came from Nekopha, which appears to have lain between Bethlehem and Anathoth (Ezra ii. 22; Nehem. vii. 26). Jaazaniah came from Maacha, which is mentioned in 2 Sam. x. 6, 8; 1 Chron. xix. 6, and Josh. xii. 5, together with Syrian districts, and, in Deut. iii. 14, is mentioned as lying on the boundary of the country east of the Jordan. He was, therefore, a naturalized alien.—By the servants of the Chaldees (ver. 24) we have to understand the officers whom Nebuchadnezzar had left to govern the country, and whom he had perhaps put under Gedaliah's command. The latter, therefore, makes promises on their behalf, provided that the Jewish captains would acquiesce in the new order of things.—Ver. 25. In the seventh month, that is, only two months after the destruction of Jerusalem (ver. 8). Of the seed royal; this is expressly stated in order to show what incited him to this action. He believed that he, as a descendant of the royal house, had a claim to the position of governor. According to Jerem. xl. 14 he was also incited to this action by Baalis, king of the Ammonites, who no doubt would have been very glad to throw off the Chaldean yoke.—The author breaks off abruptly with ver. 26, and simply states the result of this act. The people, fearing the return and vengeance of the Chaldeans, fled into Egypt. For further details see Jerem. xl.—xlii.

Ver. 27. In the seven and thirtieth year of the captivity. See the Chronological Remarks above. In Jerem. lii. 31 the twenty-fifth day is given instead of the twenty-seventh, in the Hebrew text, and in the Sept. the twenty-fourth, evidently in consequence of a mistake in the numerals. We see from this accuracy in the date what significance was attached to the event. Evilmerodach was the son and successor of Nebuchadnezzar. He only reigned two years and was put to death by his brother-in-law, Neriglassar (Berosus, cited in Josephus c. Apion. i. 20). The signification of Evil is uncertain. Merodach, or Berodach, was the name of the Babylonian Mars. We find it in the composition of other proper names also (see notes on xx. 12). In the year that he became king. For מָלְכוֹ we find in Jerem. lii. 31: מָלְכוֹ, i. e., of his reign, equivalent to: When he came to be king. This is evidently more correct. Sept.: ἐν τῷ ἐνιαυτῷ τῆς βασιλείας αὐτοῦ. נָשָׂא אֶת-רָאֵשׁ, as in Gen.

xl. 13, 20, means, To lift up the head (for some one), i. e., inasmuch as captives moved about in despondency, with bowed heads, to lift up their heads is to release them from captivity, despair, and misery (Job x. 15, cf. Judges viii. 28). Here again the text before us is abbreviated. It omits וַיָּנֶחַ, which is found in Jerem. lii. 31, before מִבֵּית.

This deliverance from captivity was an act of grace performed by him at his accession, but there seems to have been a special ground for it in the case of Jehoiachin, as he was preferred before the other captive kings. ["The rabbis say that Evilmerodach had formed a friendship with Jehoiachin in prison, into which Nebuchadnezzar had cast the former because he had been guilty of excesses in carrying on the government during an illness of the king, and had expressed pleasure at the same; evidently a fiction based on this passage and Dan. iv." (Thenius).]—And set his throne above, &c., ver. 28. This certainly means that he gave him the preference and the higher rank. Whether he merely held him in higher estimation (Rosenmüller, Keil), or "allowed him actually to occupy a more elevated seat" (Hitzig, Thenius), is not a matter of importance. The kings that were with him in Babylon, are "those who, having been deprived, like Jehoiachin, of their kingdoms, were forced to enhance the triumph and glory of the court at Babylon, cf. Judges i. 7" (Hitzig).—Ver. 29. And changed his prison-garments. Instead of the late Aramaic form נִסְּיָא we find in Jerem. lii. 33 נִסְּיָא. The subject is not Evilmerodach (Hitzig), but Jehoiachin, who is the subject of the following verb נִסְּיָא. In נִסְּיָא the suffix can only refer to Jehoiachin and not to Evilmerodach. It would be a false inference, therefore, that Jehoiachin's period of grace only lasted through Evilmerodach's short reign. "Jehoiachin ate in person at the royal table, but he probably also received an allowance for the support of his little court, consisting of his servants and attendants" (Hitzig). Here again this text is abbreviated. In Jeremiah there follow after נִסְּיָא the words: "until his death." Here those words are omitted as unnecessary after: all the days of his life. The Sept. also have these words in this place. The fact that they omit them in Jerem. lii. 34 does not justify the assumption of Thenius that they were borrowed from ver. 29, and are not original in that place. Hitzig very properly declares that they are "evidently genuine," and adds: "In ver. 11 'all the days of his life' might well be omitted. Here, however, where he narrates something joyful, the author looks back once more, after fixing the term or limit, over the entire period of good fortune. Cf. 1 Kings v. 1; xv. 5." He wants to tell once more what good fortune Jehoiachin enjoyed until the end of his life, and how Evilmerodach at least had the intention of providing for him. This good fortune lasted until Jehoiachin's death, whether he died before or after Evilmerodach.

APPENDIX.—After the words: So Judah was carried away out of their land, there follows, in Jerem. lii. 28–30, the following statement, which is omitted in the book of Kings: "This is the people whom Nebuchadnezzar carried away captive; in the seventh year three thousand Jews and three and twenty. In the eighteenth year of Nebuchadnezzar he carried away captive from Jerusalem eight hundred thirty and two persons. In the three and twentieth year of Nebuchadnezzar, Nebuzar-adan, the captain of the guard, carried away captive of the Jews seven hundred forty and five persons. All the persons were four thousand and six hundred." 2 Kings xxv. 22–26 is wanting in Jeremiah lii. because its statements had been given in detail in chaps. xl. and xli.; the statements above quoted are inserted in Jerem. lii. because they had not been given before, as they are in 2 Kings, in chap. xxiv. 14–16. The numbers given in Jeremiah vary very much from those in Kings. The former, however, are recommended, as Hitzig says, by their detail; they cannot have been invented. They are evidently derived from a different source, and the only question is, what relation does that source bear to the statements in the book of Kings? Of the three separate deportations mentioned, one took place in the seventh, and one in the eighteenth, year of Nebuchadnezzar. These can be no other than the one which took place according to 2 Kings xxiv. 12, in the eighth, and the one which took place according to 2 Kings xxv. 8 and Jerem. lii. 12, in the nineteenth year of Nebuchadnezzar.

The eighteenth year of Nebuchadnezzar would be, as is expressly stated in Jerem. xxxii. 1, the tenth of Zedekiah, that is, the year in which Jerusalem was first besieged. There cannot have been any deportation in this year. Again, the seventh year of Nebuchadnezzar would not be the year in which Jehoiachin reigned for three months, and in which it is said that he and ten thousand others were led into exile, but the last year of Jehoiakim. In this year there was no deportation. We are therefore compelled to assume, if we will not alter all the other chronological data in the book of Jeremiah itself, that the original document from which Jerem. lii. 28–30 is derived, reckons the reign of Nebuchadnezzar from another starting-point from that which is adopted in the book of Kings and elsewhere in Jeremiah. This may well be, inasmuch as the years of Nebuchadnezzar's reign do not coincide exactly with those of the Jewish kings. The difference, however, only amounts to one year. The third deportation in the twenty-third year must, therefore, have taken place in the twenty-fourth year. It is not mentioned in Kings at all, but no doubt took place. In view of the continual disposition to revolt, it is very likely that he carried off more of the people in his twenty-third or twenty-fourth year, especially as he was at that time busy besieging Tyre. He intrusted this duty to the same officer who had had charge of the previous deportation. There is a much more serious difficulty in regard to the number of the exiles. According to Jerem. lii. 28 there were only 3,023 in the first deportation; according to 2 Kings xxiv. 14 there were 10,000. Josephus says there were 10,832. Evidently he has joined the 10,000 in Kings, for the first deportation, with the 832 in Jeremiah for the second (Antiq. x. 7, 1). Thenius suggests that the sign for ten (yod) may have resembled the sign for three (gimel) in the original document from which these statements are derived, and so 3,023 took the place of 10,023. This last would then be the accurate number for which 10,000 is the round number. But the sum given at the end, 4,600, supports 3,023 in this place, and this testimony cannot be put aside by the critical decree that: "The summation at the end was interpolated by the redactor." According to Ewald, "עֶשְׂרֵה has fallen out after שְׁבַע in ver. 28 just as certainly as it has fallen out after שְׁמֹנֶה in the statement of Jehoiachin's life in 2 Chron. xxxvi. 9." According to this we should have to take it as referring, not to the deportation mentioned in 2 Kings xxiv. 14, but to the later one under Zedekiah. The seventeenth of Nebuchadnezzar was the 9th of Zedekiah, and in that year Nebuchadnezzar advanced against Jerusalem (2 Kings xxv. 1). He took the city in Zedekiah's eleventh year (2 Kings xxv. 2), and before that no deportation can have taken place. The discrepancy between 10,000 and 3,023 can hardly be accounted for otherwise than by the explanation of Estius. In ver. 28 the 3,023 are expressly mentioned as "Jews," that is, persons who belonged to the tribe of Judah. The 10,000 included persons not of that tribe, Benjamites and others who had joined themselves to Judah, since it alone represented the Israelitish nationality, and who made common cause with it against the Chaldeans. There may well have been 7,000 of these, and the entire number in the first captivity, including the 3,023 "Jews," was thus 10,000. It is evident that the statements in Jerem. lii. 28-30 are meant to apply only to the persons of the tribe of Judah (see יהודה ver. 27), and not to all who were carried away captive. This opinion is also favored by the number 4,600 as the sum of the exiles, for this number would be far too small for the sum of all the persons carried into captivity. [There can be no doubt that Jerem. lii. 28-30 refers to the Jews who were taken captive. What reason have we for supposing that 2 Kings xxiv. 14 refers to or includes any others than Jews? There is none. It is only an invention for the sake of harmonizing the two passages. Then the probabilities are against it. The persons carried away were chosen on account of their rank, position, and influence. We have an instance in Jaazaniah of Maacha (ver. xxv. see Ezeret, notes on that verse) that others than men of Judah held power and rank. Shebna the scribe (Isai. xxii. 15) is another instance to prove that in the time before the captivity pure Israelitish, much more pure Jewish blood, was not necessary to hold high office in Jerusalem. The persons of the highest rank were the ones taken away—as such—whether Jews or not. Non-Jews were, of course, rare exceptions. Of the common people large numbers were spared. Naturally people of Judah, who were most deeply interested in the fate of Jerusalem, would be taken first, together with such of other tribes or nationalities as were dangerous from their rank and influence and ability. It is, therefore, improbable that many non-Jews of the common people were carried away. It amounts to a certainty that the exiles were not composed of non-Jews in the ratio of 7,000 to 3,000. This explanation must, therefore, be abandoned. It is the only true policy, in this and in similar cases, to take note of the discrepancy as a fact, and to abandon the attempt at forced and strained explanations. Between the two accounts, that in Jeremiah deserves the preference as the more specific, and also as the more moderate statement. The larger number and the round number is suspicious.—W. G. S.] Only 832 were taken away in the second deportation, because there were only so many left of the more influential people. The 745 who were taken away at the third deportation were not inhabitants of Jerusalem but יהודים (ver. 30). The smallness of this number is due to the fact that most of the Jews, properly speaking, had been taken away before.

[The numbers certainly are astonishingly small in one point of view, though in another we are not surprised that they are no larger. Taking the number of Israelites who entered Palestine at the lowest estimate, and noticing the numbers which formed the armies, or were engaged in battle at various times, as well as the pictures of society which are given, especially by Isaiah and the other older prophets, we get the impression that there was a very large population in Palestine before the Assyrian Empire began to press upon the North. On the other hand, when we consider the great difficulty of leading a large mass of people, with the aged, the women, and the children, on a long journey through a rough country, we can hardly conceive it possible that the conquerors should have taken away an entire population. The Assyrians, however, blotted out the kingdom of the ten tribes. The whole picture which is presented to us gives the impression that the land was depopulated and left desert. The wild beasts took possession of it. Not enough remained to continue the ancient traditions and worship there. It was found necessary to begin almost de novo in the population and cultivation of the country. So too in Judah. The pictures presented by the prophets and in the Psalms, as well as by the books of Ezra and Nehemiah, are those of a depopulated and desert country. Such numbers were taken away that some had to be left on purpose to cultivate the land. When the exiles came back they had to re-found the nation. Now we hear that there were only 4,600 exiles in all, or, at most, 10,000. This seems reasonable in view of the difficulty of transportation, but it is difficult to see how it accounts for the destruction of the nation. Two suggestions present themselves: in the first place, the last 150 years, with their internal dissensions, their reformations and revolutions, their counter-reformations and counter-revolutions, as well as their foreign wars, may have greatly reduced the population. In the second place, in a nation such as Judah was, the centre of gravity of the nationality was, no doubt, in the upper and better classes. The poor and uneducated and humble were probably very dependent upon the more fortunate classes. One proof of it is the fact that the prophets and psalmists were continually rebuking the arrogance of the latter towards the former. The Babylonian king's policy of carrying off the "chief men" may, therefore, have been radical and all sufficient for rooting out the nationality.—W. G. S.]

Those who were carried away last were probably those who had formerly been considered harmless, but whom it was found, upon experience, inexpedient to trust. However the numbers may be explained, it is certain from Jerem. lii. 28-30 that there were only three deportations, and not six, as Usher and the Calm. Bib. assume, viz., the first in the seventh of Jehoiakim (Dan. i. 1, 3 (?)), the second in the seventh of Nebuchadnezzar, the third under Jehoiachin, the fourth in the eighteenth, the fifth in the nineteenth, and the sixth in the twenty-fourth year of Nebuchadnezzar. Later scholars have reduced these to four: the first under Jehoiakim, the second under Jehoiachin, the third under Zedekiah, and the fourth some years after the destruction of Jerusalem. But this is not correct, for there is no hint of any deportation under Jehoiakim either in Kings or Chronicles or Jeremiah. So much only may be accepted, that Daniel was sent to Babylon as a hostage when Jehoiakim became a vassal of Nebuchadnezzar (2 Kings xxiv. 1). Perhaps, also, at that time Jehoiakim gave some of the temple utensils to the enemy to pacify him (2 Chron. xxxvi. 6, 7).

HISTORICAL AND ETHICAL

1. The destruction of Jerusalem did not take place immediately after the fall of the city, but one month later. It is clearly designated in the record as a later and independent event. Nebuzar-adan who "stood before the king of Babylon" (Jerem. lii. 12), who, that is, attended his orders, came to Jerusalem, by the express command of the king, not to take the city, which had not yet been captured (as Thenius thinks), but, as ver. 9 distinctly shows, in order to destroy the captured city.

The destruction of the city was intended and distinctly commanded by Nebuchadnezzar. It was the punishment which the king had decreed and which Nebuzar-adan was to execute. He went methodically to work. First of all he caused the temple to be burned, then the royal palace, then the houses of the great men, then he tore down the walls, and finally he took the inhabitants away. In vers. 13-17 the account returns to the temple and enumerates its decorations and furniture, which were destroyed or carried off. The utter destruction of the temple cannot have been insisted on, on account of the value of the objects it contained, for these were not of gold, like the ones which had formerly been carried away (chap. xxiv. 13). The only ground for it was that the temple had especial significance, as the dwelling of the one God in the midst of His chosen people. Both politically and religiously it was the centre of the State, the basis and the bond of the national unity. It was the building of chief importance, and was, therefore, to be destroyed first and utterly. The temple worship had become, under the four last kings, a mere external ceremonial. Even the priests made of it a mere hypocritical show, so that Jeremiah cried out: "Trust ye not in lying words, saying, The temple of the Lord, the temple of the Lord, the temple of the Lord are these" (Jerem. vii. 4). Then he commanded them to repent and amend. They did not, however, and so the externals in which they trusted were taken from them. The destruction of the temple was the seal of God's truth impressed upon the words of the prophets, in which the people had not believed (Jer. xxvii. 19-22). The two brazen columns are mentioned first and chiefly in the description of the glories of the temple. (They are described with more detail in Jeremiah than in Kings.) The cause of this is, as we saw in the Exeg. note on 1 Kings vii. 21 and Hist. § 5 on 1 Kings vii. 1-51, that these columns represented the foundation and the strength of the temple, and were, therefore, in a certain measure, representatives of Jehovah. The destruction and removal of these showed, more than any other event, that the house of Jehovah, as the physical centre of the theocracy, had come to an end. The ark of the covenant is not mentioned in either account. It seems to have been removed from the temple before its destruction. It had been removed under Manasseh or Amon, for Josiah commanded the levites to bring it back into the temple (2 Chron. xxxv. 3). We may suppose that it was removed again under one of the following kings, perhaps under Jehoiakim. What became of it we cannot tell. The inference from Jer. iii. 16 that it was no longer in existence in the time of Jeremiah (Hitzig) is not justified. Some suppose, as Carpzov does (Apparat. Crit. p. 298), that it was among the articles which Nebuchadnezzar caused to be either destroyed or carried off in the time of Jehoiachin (chap. xxiv. 13; 2 Chron. xxxvi. 10). The story of the rabbis that Josiah had caused it to be hidden in a subterranean chamber, and that Jeremiah commanded those who fled to Egypt (chap. xxv. 26) to take it with them, and that they hid it in a cleft of the mountain on which Moses had once been (2 Macc. ii. 5. Cf. Buxtorf, De arca fed., cap. 22. Winer, R.-W.-B. I. s. 203), sounds very wild.

2. The fall of the kingdom of Judah was, according to the distinct statement of the Scriptures, the divine judgment which had long been threatened by the prophets (Isai. xxxix. 6, 7; 2 Kings xxi. 10-15; Jerem. xix. 3-13). It fell when all Jehovah's attempts to recall the chosen people to their allegiance had failed, and the apostasy from Him and from His law had reached the utmost limit. Sun and Moon, Baal and the Queen of Heaven, Adonis and Astarte, all the host of heaven were worshipped, and children were sacrificed to Moloch in the valley of Hinnom. Idols stood even in the House of Jehovah; idol-altars stood in the streets. On the hills, on the roofs, in the groves, incense was offered to idols. There was no abomination of idolatry which was not practised. All that remained of the Jehovah worship was external ceremonial, and priests and prophets uttered lies (Jerem. vii. 17, 18, 30, 31, 32; viii. 2; xi. 12, 13; xvii. 2; xix. 4, 5, 13; xxxii. 29, 34, 35; Ezek. viii. 3, 9, 10, 14; xliii. 38, 39, &c.). Moral corruption kept pace with this religious apostasy: "Will ye steal, murder, and commit adultery, and swear falsely, and burn incense unto Baal, and walk after other gods whom ye know not; and come and stand before me in this house, which is called by my name, and say: We are delivered to do all these abominations?" [Lit. we are concealed to do, &c., i. e., we have impunity] (Jerem. vii. 9, 10). Avarice, love of gain, and cheating (Jerem. vi. 13), licentiousness and whoredom (Jerem. v. 8, 9), injustice and violence (Jerem. vi. 6), shedding innocent blood (Jerem. ii. 34; vii. 6), overriding justice and right (Jerem. vii. 6), falsehood and hypocrisy (Jerem. viii. 9, 10), bigotry and obstinacy (Jerem. vii. 24-26), infidelity and perjury (Jerem. ix. 2, 3, 7), in short, all sins and vices were prevalent, especially among the rich and great. "Run ye to and fro through the streets of Jerusalem, and see now and know, and seek in the broad places thereof, if ye can find a man, if there be any that executeth judgment, and that seeketh the truth, and I will pardon it" (Jerem. v. 1; cf. 2 Chron. xxxvi. 14-16). So the measure had become full. Judah had fallen lower than Israel, therefore the Lord cast it away from before His face as He had cast away Israel (2 Kings xvii. 20; xxiv. 20). As there the king of Assyria, so here the king of Babylon was the instrument of the divine judgment, "the rod of his anger," which, after it had served His purpose, He broke and cast into the fire (Jerem. i. 17, 18; cf. Isai. x. 5). This punishment, however, was not the annihilation of the chosen people, but the sole radical cure for it. The Lord keeps His promises even while He chastises and punishes. The only means by which the chosen people could preserve and fulfil its destiny in human history, to bring the knowledge of God and salvation to all nations, was by the downfall of the visible kingdom, the earthly theocracy. The downfall of the visible kingdom was a step in the divine economy of salvation, and it marked progress towards the true kingdom of God. The people needed to be convinced of the nothingness of the visible kingdom, and to have its attention directed to the new, spiritual, true, and eternal kingdom. This was the aim of the divine judgment, to awaken an appreciation of this kingdom and a longing for it, and this aim was reached in the end. The idea of the messianic kingdom which the prophets had brought forward long before the downfall of the visible kingdom, but which had fallen uncomprehended, now took firm root. Hasse well says (Gench. des A. B. s. 136):

"It belonged to the consummation of the history of Israel that Judah also should perish. It had long ago made this necessary by its backsliding after every momentary reformation, and by its obstinate resistance to every call of grace; but the power of the Davidic element to recover from corruption had thus far saved it. This power exhausted its last energies in Josiah, and, after his death, the kingdom sank rapidly into ruins. As the old passed away, the prophets were obliged to turn and give expression to what they perceived as something new and future. A sharp division separated this new from the old. On the one hand, the judgment and penalty were recognized as a penalty of death. On the other hand arose the figure of the new life, and it was transfigured into a lofty ideal." Lisco (Das A. T. I. s. 538) gives a similar conception: "The breach which was made by the separation of the kingdom was never healed. On the contrary, its evil effects lasted on until the downfall, first of Ephraim and then of Judah. In the measure in which the political confusion and decay increased, and the impending calamity approached, in the same measure the prophetic word grew loud and clear, and, when the blow fell which destroyed the Jewish nation, Jeremiah arose upon the ruins of Jerusalem, Daniel appeared as a prophet to speak in the name of his people before the king of Babylon, and Ezekiel watched over the scattered remnants of the nation who were in exile on the Chaboras. The civil power was dead; the prophetic power survived its death." The fall of Jerusalem forms the most important crisis in the history of the ancient people of God. It was not an event between two nations; it was an event in the history of the world. Many a great nation fell both before and after, but the fall of none of them had anything like the significance for the history of the world which that of Judah had. It is an event which is as unique in history as the Jewish people was unique among nations, for "Salvation cometh of the Jews" (John iv. 22). By its fall Judah became the keeper and bearer of salvation for all the world (cf. Jerem. xxx.-xxxiii.).

3. The deportation of conquered peoples from their country was the ordinary policy of the ancient Asiatic conquerors, in order that the nationality might thus be obliterated (see Ezег. on 1 Kings viii. 46 sq.). In this case, however, the effect was, on the contrary, in the providence of God, to preserve the conquered people in all their peculiarity of character and calling and destiny. Herein consists the great difference between the downfall of Samaria and that of Judah, as we saw above (2 Kings xvii. Hist. § 3); whereas the exile of the people of the ten tribes in Assyria served to annihilate their nationality, and they sank lower and lower until they disappeared from history, the exile of the people of Judah in Babylon served only to strengthen and purify them, so that they far out-lived the world-monarchy which had conquered them. Nothing could show more clearly the indestructibility of the chosen people than this fact; that the event which should have destroyed them only served to purify and strengthen them. The distress of the captivity brought them to their senses, and made them see their own sinfulness. They repented, and turned to Jehovah and to His Law with a sincerity which they had never before felt. The exile awakened in them a deep longing for the promised land, for the city in which Jehovah had placed His name (2 Kings xxi. 7), for the temple which was the pledge of the selection of Israel to be the chosen people, and the centre of its nationality. This is expressed in Ps. cxxxvii. and cxxvi. It was a dispensation of Divine Providence that the king of Babylon did not do as the king of Assyria had done in Samaria—bring heathen colonists to settle in the land of Judah after its population was taken away. If he had done so a mixed population would have grown up there and the land would have become the home of many diverse religions and forms of worship (2 Kings xvii. 24-33; cf. 2 Kings xvii. Hist. §§ 4 and 5). Judah maintained its purity of religion and nationality both in captivity and in the home country. The exiles retained their national constitution (Ezek. xiv. 1; xx. 1; Sus. v. 28). According to the Talmud (Gem. Makkoth i. 1; Sanhedr. i. 12, 21) they were put under a ראש הקלטה [Governor of the captivity, i. e., of the captives] of their own nation. The practice of their religion was also allowed them, but they could not offer sacrifices, because they lacked the one central sanctuary at which alone sacrifice might be offered. This only increased their longing to erect the sanctuary once more, and this longing endured until the time of chastisement was at an end (Jerem. xxv. 12; xxix. 10). When they returned their first care was to rebuild the sanctuary (Ez. i. 3; vi. 3).

4. The two brief narratives by which the author closes his work are not mere appendages to the history, but the proper epilogue to the words: "So Judah was carried away out of their land." They are parallel, in a certain manner, to the review which the author gives in chap. xvii. 7 sq. of the history of Israel. The first of these incidents shows us how deep was the corruption which had pervaded the kingdom, and how hopelessly depraved the monarchical constitution had become. It was not possible any longer to have even a deputy-king under Babylonian sovereignty. Gedaliah, whom Nebuchadnezzar had left as governor, was put to death after a few months in spite of his oath (ver. 24), and the murderer, Ishmael, who desired to make himself king, was obliged to flee with his followers into the territory of the Ammonites. Others fled, for fear of the vengeance of the Chaldeans, into Egypt. Every attempt to unite the scattered remnants, and to set up at least the shadow of a monarchy, failed. Judah could not any longer stand any kind of a monarchy. It was incapable of sustaining an independent existence under an independent dynasty. The inauguration of such a government only served to produce greater confusion and disorder. The events which followed the destruction of Jerusalem only showed how necessary the divine chastisement had become. This is what the author desires to show by the first incident which he relates. However, he could not and would not close his work, which was written primarily for those who, like himself, were living in exile, with such a sad and hopeless incident. He therefore adds the story of the deliverance of Jehoiachin from his prison after thirty-seven years of captivity. He thereby offers to the people who sat weeping "by the waters of Babylon," and thinking of Jerusalem, a prospect into a more hopeful future. The release of Jehoiachin "was the first ray of light in the long night of the captivity . . . and was a guarantee to the people that the Lord would keep His promise, and would not withdraw his grace from the house of David forever" (Keil). It gave the captive people hope that the hour of their deliverance also would come. The author could not have given a more appropriate close to his work, in which he had shown God's plan of grace and redemption in the history of the chosen people.

5. In conclusion, we must notice the manner in which the latest modern historians conceive of, and represent, the fall of Judah. "There had been," says Duncker (Gesch. des Alt. I. s. 542), "no increase in power since the time of Hezekiah. There was no better guarantee for the existence of a small State than there had been at that time. If Egypt went on, as it had begun under Psammetichus, making conquests in Asia, and if a new great power arose to inherit and increase the might which Assyria had once possessed, the existence of Judah would once more be threatened as seriously as it was in the time of Hezekiah (s. 552): The effort of the nation to regain its independent existence, the stiff-necked resistance with which the Jews were ready to fight for their fatherland, and to break the yoke of the foreigner, were as well justified as was the abstract religious policy of Jeremiah. Who can blame those who hold the duty of sacrificing one's life for one's country, even under the most hopeless circumstances, higher than the counsel to submit at discretion? Who can blame those who regarded Jeremiah's conduct and policy as ruinous, who demanded that Jeremiah should stand on the side of his own nation against the foreign foe, and who stigmatized his discourses as treason? . . . (s. 553): He (Jeremiah) is bitter and violent enough to call down bloody destruction upon his [personal] enemies (Jerem. xv. 5). . . . (s. 556): However much Jeremiah's assertions were calculated to discourage the king and people, they did not have that effect. It was natural that Jeremiah should seem to the people to be a cowardly traitor. . . . (s. 557): Jeremiah's persistence in advising submission, under the circumstances, finally so far outraged the chief men that they demanded his life of the king . . . (s. 544): The prophet went so far in his opposition to Jehoiakim that he finally brought his own life into danger. At the same time he irritated the people against himself by his persistent prophecies of the coming fall of Jerusalem. . . . He was no less severe against the people for the wickedness of their conduct, and for their practice of some remains of foreign usages which had not been eradicated by the (new) Law-book." It is hardly necessary to say that this view is diametrically opposed to that of the Bible, and yet the biblical documents are the only authority for the history. In the text the grounds of the national downfall are stated to be the apostasy of the nation in religion, its corruption in morals, and the unfaithfulness, tyranny, and depravity of its king. The downfall is represented as a divine judgment upon the nation in punishment for all this. Duncker, however, ignores this view. In his view all is explained by the physical weakness of the kingdom of Judah in face of the great world-empires, Assyria, Egypt, and Babylon. It was all due to external and natural causes, such as have often produced similar catastrophes in human history. It was an undeserved misfortune, in which the king and people appear battling with desperate courage for the highest national interests. They appear great and admirable, while the truly great one, the prophet, who was persecuted while laboring for the true welfare of the people, who held firm and impregnable as a rock in the midst of the storm, is represented as a factious oppositionist, nay, even as a traitor. This is not writing history, but turning it upside down.

[The facts of history are one thing; their philosophy is another. The theocratic philosophy of history is one thing, and the purely human philosophy of it is another. To pass behind history and trace the moral causes which were at work, and observe their effects, is the great task of the historian, but he limits himself to the second causes, and contents himself with seeing God's plan only in the grand results of centuries, and in the movements of epochs. The attempt to pursue this latter investigation into details never succeeds when men try it. God's Providence is in every event of history, and in the character of every historical personage, but its presence and its operation there are matters of faith. Try to seize it, to specify it, and to examine it, and you are baffled and disappointed. God is in every blade of grass. His presence there is clear to our reason, our conscience, and our faith. If we hastily infer that, if God is in the blade of grass which we hold in our hands, then we can seize Him and see Him, and if we betake ourselves to the microscope and the dissecting apparatus, we find that we fail. Just so it is here in history. This biblical history is the only one we have in which the history is written from the theocratic standpoint, and in which the presence of God in history is traced step by step and man by man. If we attempt to take up this stand-point and follow it and apply it rigorously we involve ourselves in hopeless contradictions. The standpoint is not rational, it is prophetic; that is, its norm and standard of consistency is that of the divine plan, not of the human reason. The reason, however, is the only instrument at our disposal, and it falls short of its task if it undertakes to adopt the prophetic method. It took a prophet to give us this view of the Jewish history, and it would require a prophet to apply the same method elsewhere, or to follow it here into greater detail. Duncker lays aside the theocratic and prophetic conception, and approaches the facts of the history, as here recorded, in exactly the same spirit, and with exactly the same method, by which he treats the history of Egypt, Assyria, and Greece. His work is a universal history. The history of Israel as an earthly monarchy enters into the scope of his work as regards its earthly and external fortunes. Its theological and religious significance are aside from his plan. He is an historian, not a prophet, and he can only treat history as ordinary historians treat it. His view, therefore, naturally appears low and worldly and commonplace, when quoted in a book of this kind, which is avowedly biblical and theocratic, and only follows and explains the biblical presentation. His undertaking is a legitimate one for an historian. We cannot say that it is wrong for him to treat history as he does, and to include Jewish history in his plan, but he is engaged in a work whose stand-point and aim are so different from that in which we are engaged, that we are not called to consider it here. His readers must add to his representation of the history the explanation and philosophy of it which is furnished by their Bibles. The distinction which is brought out here is one which it is most important to bear in mind in commenting on the historical books.—As for Jeremiah's attitude at the siege of Jerusalem, the question is the one which always arises in such cases between prudence and valor. The rôle which was filled by Jeremiah, to give wise and prudent counsel to men who are heated with the strongest passions, and to stem alone a tide of feeling which animates a body of men of which he is a member, and with which he is expected to sympathize without reserve or question, is the most thankless one which can possibly devolve upon any man. He cannot succeed in persuading his companions; he can only draw down persecution on himself. His only consolation is his fidelity to his convictions, and our judgment of him, as of any other man who has the courage to undertake the prophet's task, must be regulated by the issue. He stakes all upon the wisdom of his counsel. If in a calm view of the situation and its results we see that he was wise and right, we must "blame" those who persecuted him and denied the wisdom of his counsel. Humanly speaking, Jeremiah was the only wise counsellor in Jerusalem, for his counsel would have saved the city and the national existence, if not the national independence. If, however, we turn to the theocratic standard, we see how utterly impossible it is for us to apply it. As we have seen above (§ 2), the fall of Jerusalem was no step backwards, but a great one forwards, in the development of the redemptive plan. When a church or a nation reaches the point of saying "The temple of the Lord, the temple of the Lord are these," that is, when it puts its trust in externals, in ceremonies, and sacred houses, and sacred things, while the spirit of truth and righteousness is lost, and treats God's promises as if He had bound His own hands against punishing their sins, their fate is sealed. The downfall of Jerusalem might have been delayed, it could not have been averted, or if it had been averted, as far as we can judge, all the religious truth of which Israel was the keeper and witness would have been lost. Here, however, is just the difficulty. History only takes one course of two or more which are conceivable. This one only is open to our study and observation, and we are forced to assume that that was God's plan. The consequences of the other policy, supposing it to have been adopted, are a pure matter of speculation. Now Jeremiah counselled submission. That might have saved the city and the temple and the nationality, but, if we can rely upon our judgment expressed in § 2, it would have sacrificed the kingdom of God. He also preached amendment and righteousness as the only condition of permanent safety, but we cannot see, as far as we judge, that such amendment was possible until after severe chastisement, and it remains for us, what it was for Jeremiah, a subject of faith, that God would have preserved the national independence if the people had repented.—W. G. S.]

Ewald's presentation of the fall of Jerusalem (Geesch. III. s. 712-717) is very different from Duncker's superficial and perverted view of it. As he sees in the whole course of the history, from the time of Solomon on, a continual conflict between two "independent authorities," the monarchy and the prophetic institution, and explains this conflict by the "violence" which was characteristic of either (see Pt. II. pp. 103 and 4), so he finds the causes of the ruin of the kingdom in this conflict.

"It remained to be shown, by the fate of Judah also, that violence destroys its own cause, even when that cause seems to be the most permanent and enduring. . . . The second of these independent powers, the prophetic institution, was now also irrevocably broken." The reason why the prophetic office no longer possessed its ancient power was that "it had rid itself of the last relics of the violence which marked it even in Isaiah, and had risen to a purely spiritual activity and influence. It was long since violence had been able to accomplish any sound results even in the prophetic office. Thus the highest prophetic activity lost its power when it lost its force and violent forms of action, and the second of the two forces on which the nationality rested was radically ruined. . . . When the two forces which could alone carry and preserve the nation were thus worn out, when the nation could no longer find either the right king or the right prophet, it sank rapidly towards its catastrophe. Then first did the evils which had long threatened it, or which had made themselves temporarily felt, become fatal to it." In this view also the idea which is made uppermost in the biblical narrative, that the fall was a divine judgment justly and deservedly inflicted as a punishment for persistence in sin, is obscured and neglected, and the fall is represented as a catastrophe which was the legitimate result of a regular development. [There is no real disagreement here. The one is a pragmatic and the other is a philosophical statement of the same idea. The ancient Hebrew writer states it as a balance between so much sin and so much punishment. We cannot expect a critical and philosophical statement from him. In his view God stands over the sinful nation patiently and with long-suffering, and finally His hand falls in punishment. The modern German critic sees, in "persistence in sin," the adoption of certain depraved doctrines, principles, and modes of thought, which form a creed or sum of convictions tacit or expressed. These produce a reiteration of unchaste, immoral, and irreligious acts—sins. This finally becomes a national habit, a characteristic of the nationality. It rises into a moral cause, and according to the laws of God's moral government, this cause will in time produce inevitably certain moral and physical results—national decay (which will show itself first in the most vital organs of the State, its throne, its altar, and its pulpit), and finally national ruin. The two forms of statement are identical.—W. G. S.] As for the theory that there were two "independent authorities" in the State, and that the great characteristic of each was violence—employment of force in word or deed—in fulfilling its functions, it has been sufficiently noticed on p. 104. We need only remark here, that if violence was a characteristic of Isaiah, then Jeremiah's discourses are far more forcible, vigorous, and violent than his, so that Duncker (quoted above) charges him with passion, severity, and sternness. No prophet ever rebuked the sin and apostasy of king and people with more plain and severe language than Jeremiah. It cannot be said of him that he had thrown off the violent manner of the ancient prophets, and that "one and the same ruin enveloped the last great prophet and the nation, with all of its better interests which still remained at this stormy time." His forcible words of rebuke and reproof, his endurance, pertinacity, and inflexibility, in the hardest conflicts and sufferings, down to the very end, bear testimony, not to the weakness and decay of the prophetic office, but to the fact that it was as grand, as great, and as vigorous as ever before. The monarchy sank and ceased at the fall of the kingdom, but the prophetic institution, so far from ceasing, arose again to new glory and strength. Those have the less ground for denying this who ascribe the second part of Isaiah to a great unknown prophet, who lived near the end of the captivity.

[The decay of the prophetic office is undeniable, in spite of the fact that one or two last great ones yet appeared. There had been false prophets, in greater or less number, at all times, but see the 23d chap. of Jeremiah, from the 9th verse on, for a sweeping denunciation of the contemporary prophets. No distinction between false and true is specified. Depraved priests and prophets are together branded with one terrible denunciation. In xxiii. 38-40 the degeneracy of the prophets seems to be given as the cause why Jehovah had abandoned the city. Prophecy ceased at some time—when did it cease? It did not cease abruptly, but shared the fate of all similar institutions among mankind. It degenerated into formalism and superstition (see Jerem. xxiii. 33-37). In its rise and bloom and decay we can trace undeniable steps of change, development, progress, and decline. After the exile we have a few prophets, but not like the ancient ones. The spoken word gave way to the written word; the original oracle gave way to the commentary; the prophet gave way to the scribe. Following the stream upwards we come to the "Great Unknown" (?), and to Jeremiah. We find in Jeremiah descriptions of the contemporary prophets, and we see that the institution was dying, and that the one or two great ones who yet arose were great and grand as exceptions to the prevalent degeneracy. Jeremiah was the last prophet who was a statesman also, as the old prophets had been (Stanley).—W. G. S.]

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Vers. 8-21. God's Judgment upon Judah. (a) It was well deserved (Rom. ii. 5-11); (b) it was terrible (Hebr. x. 30, 31; Deut. iv. 24); (c) it was a warning (1 Cor. x. 11; 2 Thess. i. 8-10; Isai. ii. 10-17). Comparison of the destruction of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans with its destruction by the Romans. (a) Wherein they were alike; (b) wherein they differed.—KEL: The saying that the world's history is the world's condemnation, finds its full justification in the history of Judah, and nowhere else.—Vers. 9-17. KYBURZ: No place is so strong, no building so grand, no wall so firm, that sin cannot undermine and overthrow it. Let no man trust in ceremonies, or sacred houses, or sacred traditions, so long as his heart is far from God, and his life is not in accord with his righteous creed. The destruction of the temple was a testimony that God will spare no house in which any other name than His is worshipped, or in which He is worshipped only with the lips while the hearts are far from Him. If the temple of Solomon was not spared, no physical temple can save us.—STARKE: If temples are not used for the true worship of God, He allows them to fall into the hands of unbelievers, Matt. xxiii. 37 (as at the time of the extension of Mohammedanism).—FFAFF. BIR.: The highest pitch of the divine condemnation is reached when God removes the light of His Word from its place, and takes away from us the ordinances of true worship (Rev. ii. 4, 5; 1 Pet. iv. 17).—Vers. 18-21. God often executes His judgments by means of wicked and godless men. This does not excuse or justify them in their cruelty or wickedness. They are only the rod of His anger, which he breaks after it has unconsciously served His purpose (Isai. x. 5; xiv. 3-6; Jerem. l. 51).—Ver. 21. FFAFF. BIR.: When the measure of sin is full, and the judgment of God has begun to fall, nothing can any longer arrest its flood.—CRAMER: He who will not serve God in peace and prosperity must learn to do so in misery and adversity.—OSLANDER: Those who will not serve God in their own fatherland, must serve their enemies in harsh subjection.—The Curse and the Blessing of the Exile, Deut. xxx. 19. (a) The curse consisted in this, that the Lord removed the people from before His face (chap. xxiii. 27; xxiv. 3, 20), that is, He removed them from the land of promise, in which He gave them His gracious blessings, and placed them in a distant country, where nothing was known of the true and living God. This curse, which had long been threatened (Levit. xxvi. 33; Deut. iv. 27; xxviii. 26; Dan. ix. 11) is a proof of the truth of the words: "Be not deceived; God is not mocked," &c. (Gal. vi. 7). God still does spiritually to individuals and to nations what He did to Judah—He removes them from before His face; He removes from them His word and His means of grace, if they do not repent, and leaves them to live in darkness, without Him. (b) The curse became a blessing for this people. It humiliated itself and repented. It experienced that there was no greater curse than to live far from its gracious God, and it longed for the land of promise. When it had lost its earthly kingdom and its earthly king, it learned to look for the kingdom of heaven, and for that One in whom all God's promises to man are fulfilled. The exile became a blessing for the whole world, for the Jewish nation was thereby made fit to fulfil its destiny in the redemptive plan of God. It was "a great opportunity, by which the name and glory of Jehovah were spread abroad, as a preparation for the preaching of the gospel of Christ" (Starke). We all lay under the curse of the law, but Christ has redeemed us (Gal. iii. 13, 14).

Vers. 22 to 26. See Jerem. xlii.-xliv. The People who remained in the Country. (a) Their protection by Gedaliah, vers. 22, 23, 24. ("The king's heart is in the hand of the Lord," Prov. xxi. 1. Nebuchadnezzar gave them a ruler from among their own countrymen who promised them favor and protection. So the Lord often offers consolation even in deserved misfortune, but men go their own way and plunge themselves into ruin.) (b) Their flight into Egypt (Jerem. xlii. 7; xlii. 18, 22. Their bad conscience leads them back to the country from which God had wonderfully delivered them. STARKE: When the godless attempt to flee from a calamity they plunge themselves into it. Isai. xxiv. 17 sq.).—Ver. 24. OSLANDER: It is great wisdom to bear our burdens with patience; we thus make them lighter. It is folly to resist a greater power, for thus we only make our burdens heavier.—Ver. 25. We see, by the example of Israel, how envy and jealousy, pride in high descent and destiny, and love of power, lead to the most utter ruin (Ps. v. 6; Prov. xxvii. 4). Passion makes men fools. Ishmael could not hope with his small company to resist the Chaldean power.

Vers. 27-30. Jehoiachin's Deliverance from his Prison. (a) Its significance for the whole captive people (Levit. xxvi. 44); (b) the warning which we may find therein.—An unfortunate state of things often endures for a long time. It seems that it never will end. Happy is he who does not murmur against God, but can say with the Apostle,—Rom. v. 3-5; see also Rev. ii. 10,—The time of our deliverance is in the hands of the Lord. It comes when He sees that it is best for us.—WÜRT. SUMM.: We should despair in no trouble or punishment, but cry to God and trust in Him.—Ver. 27. STARK:

Kings win great love by acts of grace and mercy (Acts xxv. 1-9).—THE SAME: We should be kind to captives, and pray to God for a loving disposition towards our enemies (Matt. v. 44).—Per Aspera ad astra! That is the way in which our Lord walked and in which we all must follow Him (Rom. viii. 17; Ps. cxxvi. 1-6).—Final Review of the History in the Apostle's words: "Oh the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God! How unsearchable are his judgments, and his ways past finding out! For of him, and through him, and to him are all things; to whom be glory forever. Amen" (Rom. xi. 33 and 36).

APPENDIX ON THE CHRONOLOGY.

1. THE chronology of the history contained in the Books of the Kings presents difficulties which have never yet been conquered. There are data in the text which are contradictory. The only means of forming any chronology at all is to sacrifice some of the statements, and the text does not offer sufficient critical grounds upon which to decide which ones are correct. The usual method has been to fill out and reconcile conflicting texts by inventing interregna and joint governments, or to guess arbitrarily which datum was to be sacrificed. It is evident that this is only another way of admitting our inability to solve the problem satisfactorily by the means which we as yet possess. All the schemes which we form must be regarded as tentative. We need to arrive at some hypothetical chronology as a stepping-stone to further investigation, but we must frankly admit, while taking this course, that the knots are neither untied nor cut, but only marked for further study by our arbitrary guesses and our fabricated interregna.

2. Bähr says in his Preface (at the end) that he has "followed a method, in regard to the Chronology, which differs somewhat from the ordinary one." It consists in adopting certain dates which have been fixed with the greatest certainty, and reckoning from these, by periods, through the intervening reigns (see Pt. II. p. 86 and the translator's note there). It is evident that this method has no independent value. The chronologers who have undertaken this task have gone minutely over the separate texts, and have managed to bridge over the difficulties by one or another hypothesis. All the uncertainty which inheres in these hypotheses must inhere also in their completed schemes. If there were a consensus in their results, it would not, therefore, produce any certainty; it would merely prove that those who have confined themselves to the biblical data, and have stepped over the difficulties by various hypotheses, reach conclusions which vary only within certain moderate limits. However, there is, in fact, no consensus among the authorities. It is fallacious, therefore, to regard these dates, which are only an average between the results of various independent scholars, as possessing any certainty. Furthermore, it seems to be labor thrown away to pore over the data for the intervening details of the chronology. The consensus in regard to one date is not greater than that in regard to any other in the whole list. If we borrow one date from the average, why not borrow the whole list in the same way? In fact, in the present state of this subject, there might be much wisdom in so doing. The general scheme about which the authorities seem to cluster is the one at which Bähr arrives. His method only borrows the results of certain independent scholars, and then travels back for a certain distance on the road by which they reached those results. In the following pages I have collected the dates upon which he fixes, and arranged them in a table. This scheme is substantially that of Usher, for, of all who have studied this subject, confining themselves to the biblical data, no one has succeeded in going much beyond what he, the first thorough student of it, established. I have also added to the table a sort of outline of the history, of the synchronisms with the contemporaneous history of other nations, and of the varying religious condition of the two Israelitish kingdoms. The data enclosed in brackets are those which are not mentioned in the text of the Bible.

3. For the final solution of the problems which present themselves we must look to the synchronisms with contemporaneous history. The deciphering of the Egyptian hieroglyphics and of the Assyrian cuneiform inscriptions has furnished us with material which promises to make a solution ultimately possible. This promise is so good that it seems unprofitable to repeat the labor of comparing and reconciling the biblical data, a labor which has already been so often performed and with such meager results. We have above (Pt. II. p. 162) an instance of the amount of light which we may hope for from these sources. If Oppert is right in his interpretation of the data in the Assyrian inscriptions which bear upon the reign of Pekah (and no one but a trained Assyrian scholar is competent to dispute his conclusions), then one of the most perplexing of these chronological problems is solved. It is true that the Assyrian scholars are not in accord as to all their results, and it is also true that many of the best living scholars (the Germans especially) are skeptical in regard to the whole system of interpretation of the cuneiform, and also that the scholars who have thus far prosecuted this subject have not always followed the independent unbiased method which would recommend their results, but, in spite of all this, the progress in this department is undeniable. Every step verifies and confirms what has gone before; the original Assyrian grammatical and lexical works multiply in an enormous ratio the rate of progress; and the results acquire such certainty as compels assent.

4. In the Athenæum of May 18th, 1867, Sir H. Rawlinson announced the discovery that two fragments in the British Museum were parts of the same stone, and that together they furnished a canon for the most important part of Assyrian history. The Assyrians had a system of naming the years after eponymous magistrates, and the canon contains a list of them, by which the chronology may be reckoned with certainty. It also contains mention of an eclipse of the sun which occurred on the 30th of the month Sivan, in the 9th year of king Asshur-edil-ili II., and which furnishes a definite starting-point, if it can be identified. Rawlinson identifies it with the eclipse of June 15th, 763. Oppert, however, identifies it with the eclipse of the 13th of June, 889. He also says that an eclipse of the sun is several times referred to in the inscriptions of Asshur-nazir-pal as having occurred on the day of that monarch's accession. This he identifies with an eclipse which took place on July 2d, 930. This eclipse is not mentioned by Rawlinson, but, if Oppert is correct in regard to it, it goes far to support his identification of the other one. The difference of 46 years in regard to the first of these eclipses, marks their respective chronologies down to the date of Tiglath Pileser II. (747 or 745). The gap is closed up in Oppert's scheme by inserting Pul between the first destruction of Assyria by the Medes and Chaldeans in 789 (an event which Rawlinson does not credit at all, but which Hincks accepted) and the accession of Tiglath Pileser II. Thus their lists compare, at this point, as follows (the names in the two lists refer to the same persons, though they are transcribed differently):—

Oppert.	Sir. H. Rawlinson.
(Lenormant's Manual).	(Prof. Rawlinson's Manual).
Asshur-edil-ilani II.	818
Eclipse 13th June	809
Asshur-likhish (the Sardanapalus of the Greeks)	800
Destruction of Nineveh	789
Pul (a Chaldean)	780
	771 Asshur-danin-II II.
	763 15th June, Eclipse
	763 Asshur-likh-khush
Tiglath Pileser II.	747
	745 Tiglath Pileser II.
but he reckoned from	744
Shalmaneser VI.*	727 Shalmaneser IV.*

In favor of Rawlinson is the fact that Pul is not mentioned in any inscription yet found or in the canon, and that Oppert is obliged to assume that the succession of eponymous magistrates was interrupted during his reign, and that, as he was a Chaldean, the account was kept, after the Chaldean fashion, by the years of his reign. In favor of Oppert's scheme is (a) the fact that it makes a chronology which is in accord with the biblical chronology, while Rawlinson would shorten the period of the Israelitish monarchy (see note 5 on the Chronological Table); (b) the fact that there was certainly a break in the succession at Tiglath Pileser's accession (Rawlinson says that he was a usurper); (c) the fact that the Era of Nabonassar of Babylon begins at 747, which is in excellent harmony with the hypothesis that, at the death of Pul, Chaldeas was unable to maintain dominion over Assyria, but found itself separate and independent, so that a new era was founded. It had not been independent for centuries before this, and it was resubjugated by Sargon in 709. (d) This combination is supported by the words: "Pul, king of Assyria," 2 Kings xv. 19. (e) It is supported by the Greek story of Sardanapalus.—It is evident that we have here a clue which promises ultimately to unravel the intricacies and contradictions of the biblical chronology.

Opposite the reign of Pekah will be found marked that solution of the contradiction in the data concerning his reign which Oppert claims to have obtained from the inscriptions. See above, p. 162 of PART II. of the COMM.

5. The other important series of synchronisms is that with Egyptian history. Here also scholars have given the most diligent labor to the scientific investigation of the evidence which bears on the biblical chronology. A fundamental question here meets us, whether the dynasties of Manetho are all consecutive, or whether some of them were parallel and contemporaneous with others. If reckoned as successive, the period which they cover reaches back to more than 5,000 years before Christ. Very many scholars, appalled at the magnitude of this period, have inferred that the dynasties must, many of them, have been contemporaneous. Lepsius adopts this view, and in his Königsbuch der Alten Ägypter he has reconstructed with admirable skill and diligence the entire list of Manetho's dynasties. Prof. Rawlinson adopts the same view, avowedly following the English Egyptologists. He carries it further than Lepsius, and, in fact, the weakness of the theory is that it may be carried as far as any one finds necessary in order to reduce the period of Egyptian history to what he considers a reasonable length. It is especially suspicious that the shortening is accomplished by putting many of the most ancient dynasties contemporaneous with one another, that is, the dynasties which fall at the time of which we know least. In Rawlinson's scheme (Manual, p. 77) six of Manetho's dynasties are put as contemporaneous in the period from 2100 to 2000. In the more modern period of the history, where we know that there were many rulers in different parts of Egypt at the same time, we find that Manetho only recognized one. The especial importance of this for us, at present, is that the synchronisms fall in such a way as to require a shortening of the period of the Israelitish monarchy. Lepsius carries out the calculation of the Israelitish chronology in consistency with his scheme for that of Egypt, and fixes the chief dates as follows (Königsbuch, ss. 102, 3, and 4): Division of the kingdom, 953; Accession of Athaliah and Jehu, 861; Fall of Samaria, 693; Destruction of Jerusalem, 586.

6. It will be seen from this and from what was said about Rawlinson's dates for Assyrian history that the chronologers may be divided into two classes or schools, the defenders of the "long period" for the Israelitish monarchy (chiefly those who rely on such a scheme as they are able to form from the biblical data), and the defenders of the "short period" (Assyrian and Egyptian scholars, who rely on the data furnished by the monuments).

7. The "short period" has always been strong from the fact that both the Assyrian and Egyptian chronologies seemed to demand it, but it will be noticed that, whatever date we may assign to the great eclipse, the Assyrian authorities fix the Fall of Samaria certainly in 721, and set aside Lepsius' date as impossible. All the shortening therefore must come before that date, but the synchronism with Tirhaka is one of the most important in the Egyptian scheme. Therefore the Assyrian and Egyptian chronologies are not in accord in the shortening which they require.

8. Others, however, discard the notion of contemporaneous dynasties, and reckon the dynasties as successive. This is carried out in Lenormant's Manual, and it brings the synchronisms into accord with the "long period" which he adopts for the Israelitish monarchy, and also with the Assyrian chronology, which he borrows chiefly from Oppert, and which has been described above.—Evidently we may hope that from this quarter also confirmatory evidence will come, and that all will converge to a reliable result. Our task here has been to give a succinct account of the present state of the question.—W. G. S.

* The same person, but different mode of counting.

CHRONOLOGICAL TABLE

OF THE

PERIOD FROM THE DIVISION OF THE KINGDOM TO THE COMPILATION OF THE BOOK OF KINGS.

Dates adopted in this Comm.	KINGS OF JUDAH.	Age at Accession.	Year of Contemp.	Duration of Reign.	KINGS OF ISRAEL.	Age at Accession.	Year of Contemp.	Duration of Reign.	SYNCHRONISMS, &c.
975	REHOBOAM.....	41	1	17	JEROBOAM.....	1	22		Jehovah-calf-worship in Israel. Fifth of Rehoboam. Shishak , king of Egypt, invades Judah. (Sheshont I. , 1st king XXII Dyn.) Hostility between Judah and Israel.
957	ABIJAM.....	18	8
955	ASA.....	30	41		NADAB.....	2	2		War between Judah and Israel.
953					BAASHA.....	3	24		Tirzah capital of Northern kingdom. Fifteenth of Asa. He defeated Zerah, "the Ethiopian," ¹ at Zephathah. Supremacy of the Jehovah-religion in Judah. Baasha attacks Asa.—Latter forms alliance with Benhadad I., ² king of Syria. Heathen idolatry in Israel.
930					ELAH.....	26	2
929					ZIMRI [OMRI, TIBNI].	27	7		Civil war in Israel for four years. ³
925					OMRI.....	31	12		923 Omri founded Samaria and made it the capital. War between Israel and Syria.
920-19					AHAB.....	38	22		Political and religious reforms in Judah. Peace and prosperity. Elijah. Phœnician idolatry (sensual and materialistic nature-worship) introduced into Israel by Jezebel.
917-16	JEHOSHAPHAT.	35	4	35					903 and 901. War between Israel and Syria. Success of Israel and alliance with Syria. Benhadad II. ⁴
898-7					AHAZIAH.....	17	2		898. Renewed war between Israel and Syria. ⁵ Revolt of Moab against Israel. Elijah. Slight and temporary reaction against Phœnician worship in Israel.
896-5					JORAM.....	18	12		Judah, Israel, and Edom in alliance against Moab, king of Moab. ⁶ Moab, Ammon, and the Edomites of Mt. Seir invade Judah, but quarrel and kill each other near Engedi.

¹ This king, who was formerly identified with Userken I. (the Osorkon of the Greeks), who was king of Egypt, is now known to be Aserch-Amen, an Ethiopian conqueror, who overran Egypt during the reign of Userken, and was not arrested until he was on the point of entering Palestine. See Lenormant, B. II. chap. iv. sec. 2, note; and B. IV. chap. iv. sec. 2.

² See Encyc. notes on 1 Kings xl. 22, and xv. 18.

³ The date given for Omri's accession (925) is the "31st of Asa," but, as Ahab followed in the "38th of Asa," Omri's 12 years' reign must be reckoned from 930, when he was first called to the throne. This would give four years for his contest with Tibni for the crown.

⁴ See Encyc. on 1 Kings xvi. 31. He put an end to a period of anarchy and founded a dynasty 987 B.C. Ashurnasirpal says, on an obelisk now in the Brit. Mus., that he took tribute of Tyre, Sidon, etc., in 916. (Lenormant, B. VI. chap. iii. sec. 2, 6.)

⁵ Shalmaneser IV. (II. R.) mentions, on a stele found near the source of the Tigris and now in the Brit. Mus., Benhadad and "10,000 of the men of Ahab of Israel" among the forces whom he defeated at Karkar in 900, the year after this alliance was formed. (Lenormant, B. II. chap. iv. sec. 3; and B. IV. chap. ii. sec. 4.) Rawlinson, in the Manual, says that Shalmaneser II. was contemporary with Ahab, but gives as the date of Shalmaneser's reign 858-823 (see p. 42), and for Ahab's reign 918-897 (p. 66). In the "Five Great Monarchies" (1 ed.) Vol. II. p. 362 note, this notice is quoted as "Ahab of Samhala," not yet having been distinctly recognized. Sir H. Rawlinson, after the discovery of the Canon, fixed the date of this battle as 923. See the Appendix to the Chron. § 4.

⁶ We should infer from 1 Kings xxii. 3, that Ramoth had not been given up to the Israelites, as, perhaps, was stipulated in the treaty of alliance three years before.

⁷ 1 Kings i. 17.

⁸ 2 Kings iii. 1.

⁹ This is probably the Mesha of the Moabite stone. See the COMM., Part II. p. 31.

CHRONOLOGICAL TABLE—(CONTINUED).

Dates adopted in this Comm.	KINGS OF JUDAH.	Age at Accession.	Year of Contemp.	Duration of Reign.	KINGS OF ISRAEL.	Age at Accession.	Year of Contemp.	Duration of Reign.	SYNCHRONISMS, &c.
892-1	JEHORAM.....	32	5	8	Jehoram introduces Phœnician idolatry into Judah; murders his six brothers and others. Edomites revolt successfully against Judah. The priest-city Libnah revolts. Afabs and Philistines invade Judah. Siege of Samaria by Benhadad and miraculous deliverance.
885-4	AHAZIAH.....	22	12 ¹⁰ 11 ¹¹	1	Hazaël in Syria. Progress of Phœnician idolatry in Judah. Israel at war with Syria (siege of Ramoth).
884	ATHALIAH.....	6	JEHU.....	28	Revolution in Israel. Massacre of Ahab's family. Religious reformation. Phœnician idolatry abolished. Massacre of Ahaziah's family, and supremacy of Phœnician idolatry in Judah. Hazaël conquers territory of Israel east of the Jordan. Shalmaneser¹² takes tribute of Jehu, 883.
877	JOASH.....	7	7	40	Restoration of the line of David and religious reformation. Phœnician idolatry abolished in Judah.
856	JEHOAHAZ.....	23	17	Limited revival of Phœnician idolatry in Israel. Hazaël continues to attack Israel. Time of depression and weakness. Israel overrun by the Syrians. Phœnician idolatry tolerated in Judah. Hazaël takes Gath and threatens Jerusalem.
840-39	JOASH.....	37	16	Benhadad III. in Syria. Israel successful against the Syrians—recovery of lost cities.
838	AMAZIAH.....	25	2	29	Phœnician idolatry once more abolished in Judah. Amaziah made a successful expedition against the Edomites and took Sela (Petra). War between Israel and Judah. Amaziah prisoner of Joash. Israelites plunder the temple.
834 833	JEROBOAM II.....	15	41 read 52	Time of strength and prosperity in Israel. Territory from Damascus to the Dead Sea recovered.
811-10	AZARIAH or UZZIAH.....	16	27 (?)	53	Luxury, folly, and vice in Israel. Amos. Time of peace and prosperity in Judah. Supremacy of the Jehovah-religion. [789. First destruction of Nineveh by the Medes and Chaldeans (?)] Elath taken from the Edomites, Gath and Ashdod from the Philistines; Ammonites and Arabs of Gubbaal tributary.
773	ZACHARIAH.....	28	6 mos	Pul¹⁶ takes tribute from Menahem.
773	SHALLUM.....	39	1 mo.
773	MENAHEM ¹⁵	39	10
763	PEKAIAH.....	50	2
760	PEKAH.....	52	20 read 30
759-6	JOTHAM.....	25	2	16	[747. Era of Nabonassar of Babylon.]

¹⁰ 2 Kings viii. 25.¹¹ 2 Kings ix. 39.¹² 2 Kings xv. 30.

¹³ This Shalmaneser (IVth, according to Lenormant; IIId, according to Rawlinson) is the same mentioned above in note 5. He reigned from 905 to 870 (Len.). Among his campaigns and exploits mentioned on the "black obelisk" (Brit. Mus.), the same mentioned in note 5, we find it stated that, in 883, he received tribute of "Jehu, son of Omri" (the change of dynasty not being known or not being remembered), and, on the same obelisk, Jehu is represented, in one of the bas-reliefs, as prostrating himself before Shalmaneser. He probably entered into tributary relations to Shalm. in order to get protection against Hazaël. (Lenormant I., 103, 381. Rawlinson, Free Gr. Mon. [2d ed.] II., 105 and 106.) This is the distress which fell upon Jehu and kept him from that energetic development of Israel which we should have expected of him. See Pt. II. pp. 114 and 115.

¹⁴ 2 Kings xvii. 1.

¹⁵ Rawlinson (Manual, p. 67) gives for Menahem's reign 772-763. On p. 44 he says that Tiglath Pileser II. took tribute of Menahem in 743. It is another case of the inconsistency mentioned above in note 5. See also the foot-note p. 161 of Part II. It is agreed that Tig. Ptl. II. is stated in the inscriptions to have taken tribute of Menahem of Israel. Oppert, by combining this with the other data, arrives at the construction mentioned on p. 163 and which is placed in the column of remarks opposite the reign of Pekah.

¹⁶ Pul is called, in 2 Kings xv. 19, "king of Assyria," but he is not mentioned in the inscriptions or the Canon. See in regard to him, p. 163 of Part II.

CHRONOLOGICAL TABLE—(CONTINUED).

Dates adopted in this Comm.	KINGS OF JUDAH.	Age of Accession.			KINGS OF ISRAEL.	Age of Accession.			SYNCHRONISMS, &c.
		Year of Contemp.	Duration of Reign.			Year of Contemp.	Duration of Reign.
743	AHAZ.....	20	17	16					[744. Tiglath Pileser II. in Assyria until 737.] [New rise of the Assyrian power.] [742. Tig. Pil. in Syria; Rezin, Pekah, and Asharish son of Tabeal, confederated against Ahas.] [742. Pekah dethroned. Menahem II. ¹⁸ set up by Tig. Pil. and tributary to him.] Assyrio-Chaldean star-worship introduced into Israel and Judah. ¹⁷ [734. Rezin and Pekah unite and revolt. Pekah regained the throne.] 733. Campaign of Rezin and Pekah against Ahas of Judah. 732. Damascus taken. 731. Forced migration of Syrians and Israelites. [730. Tiglath Pileser took Gass, Ashdod, Damascus in Arabia, and probably went to Jerusalem. ¹⁹ At the end of the same year he held a court of his vassals at Damascus, at which Pekah and Ahas were present. ²⁰] [730. Pekah in alliance with Methon of Tyre revolts against Assyria. On the approach of the Assyrians, Pekah is slain by Hoshea, who submits to pay tribute.] Phœnician idolatry and Moloch-worship encouraged in Judah. Political and religious degradation in Israel. Luxury and corruption in Judah. The temple of Jehovah closed.
730					HOSHEA.....	20 Jo- tham. ¹⁸ 19 Ahas. ¹⁶	9
728
727	HEZEKIAH.....	25	8	29					[Shalmaneser ²¹ in Assyria, 727-722.] [725. Sabecon I., ²² the first king of the XXVth Ethiopian Dyn. in Egypt.] Reformation in Judah. Revival of the Jehovah-worship. Passover renewed. 724. Hoshea, in reliance upon So, ²³ revolts against Assyria. Shalmaneser besieges Samaria. [723-704. Sargon ²⁴ in Assyria.] [719 or 718. Sargon's campaign in Phœnicia. Battle of Raphia, in which he defeats the Egyptians.] [718-14. Siege of Tyre by Sargon for five years without success.] [715 (about). New revolt of Samaria, Damascus, and Hamath subdued by Sargon.] [710 (about). Sargon's campaign against Ashdod. ²⁵] [710-704. Sargon occupied in building at Dur-Sharyukin. ²⁶] [709. Sargon defeats Merodach Baladan at Dur Yakin ²⁷ and reduces Chaldea to subjection.] [704-681. Sennacherib in Assyria.] [701. Sennacherib in Phœnicia. ²⁷] [Wins battle of Eltekon ²⁸ against the Egyptians (Sabecon II.).] 700. Sennacherib in Judah. ²⁹ Judah tributary to Assyria. Sennacherib's army destroyed. [609. Babylon in revolt against Assyria under Merodach Baladan.] Merodach Baladan sends messengers to seek an alliance with Hoshe- kiah. ³⁰
	4 OF HEZEKIAH. =				6 OF HOSHEA.
721	6 OF HEZEKIAH = FALL OF SAMARIA = 9 OF HOSHEA.

¹⁷ See Ezra, on 2 Kings xvi. 3; xvii. 16; xxiii. 12.¹⁸ See note 15.¹⁹ Cf. 2 Chron. xxviii. 20.²⁰ Cf. 2 Kings xvi. 10.²¹ See the Supplementary Note, p. 189.²² See p. 189.²³ See Ezra, on 2 Kings xvii. 4, and p. 189.²⁴ See p. 189. The Assyrian form of the name is Sharyukin.²⁵ Cf. Isa. xi. 1.²⁶ i.e. Castle of Sharyukin or Sargon. It is the modern Khornabad.²⁷ See p. 230.²⁸ See p. 230.²⁹ See p. 230.³⁰ This date is in dispute. We are told that Heskiah reigned 29 years (2 Kings xviii. 2), that Sennacherib's invasion fell in his 14th year (2 Kings xviii. 13), and that he lived 15 years afterwards (2 Kings xx. 6). These data are consistent with each other, but the second would make Sennacherib's invasion fall in 713. This is irreconcilable with Assyrian data, which seem to be beyond question. All the explanations or conjectures offered sacrifice the statements of the biblical text. They cannot be regarded as solutions of the difficulty. It should be noticed, therefore, that the dates given to this and other events connected with it are not those which the biblical text would give. See Supp. Note after Ezra on Chap. 20.³¹ See Supp. Note on Chap. 20.

CHRONOLOGICAL TABLE—(CONTINUED).

Dates adopted in this Comm.	KINGS OF JUDAH.	Age at Accession.	Duration of Reign.					SYNCHRONISMS, &c.
608	MANASSEH	12	55	[697-682. Sennacherib in constant war with Babylon, which revolts again and again.] Supremacy of the heathen religions in Judah. Persecution of Jehovah-worshippers. [681-667. Esarhaddon in Assyria.] c. 680. Manasseh captive in Babylon. ²² [Manasseh tributary.] [c. 675. Esarhaddon conquers Egypt.] [667-647. Asshurbanipal in Assyria.] ²³ 657. Phraortes establishes Median Empire.] 647-625. Ashurediliani ²⁴ in Assyria.] ²⁵ [Between 650 and 640 Psammetichus becomes independent king of Egypt.] ²⁶ [Cyaxares in Media.] Revel of Jehovah-worship. [625-606. Sarcus in Assyria.] [Nabopolassar in Babylon until 604.] ²⁴ [625. First attack of Medes and Babylonians on Nineveh. Scythian invasion.] 622. Repair of the Temple. Discovery of the Book of the Law. Great Reformation, Pass-over celebrated.
615
610	JEHOIAHAZ	23	8 mos	610. Battle of Megiddo. Josiah slain. 609. Jehoahas taken captive to Egypt. Judah tributary to Egypt. Heathenism in the ascendancy.
610	ELIAKIM OR JEHOIAKIM.	25	11	[607. Nebuchadnezzar associated with his father as king of Babylon.] ²⁴ [606. Nineveh taken by the Medes and Babylonians.] ²⁴ 605. Battle of Carchemish. Nebuchadnezzar defeats Necho. [604. Nebuchadnezzar in Babylon until 561.] 602. Nebuchadnezzar invades Judah. 599. Nebuchadnezzar again in Judah. BEARING OF THE CAPTIVITY.
598	JEHOIACHIN.	8 (?)	3 mos	598. Confederated plan of revolt with Phœnicia, Ammon, and Moab. ²⁴
598	MATTANIAH OR ZEDEKIAH.	21	11	594. Zedekiah's visit to Babylon. ²⁵ Hophra (Uahprah) in Egypt. 590. Revolt of Judah. Babylonians besiege Jerusalem.
586	Destruction of Jerusalem	587. Gedaliah killed by Ishmael. [561. Evil Merodach in Babylon.] Jehoiachin released from prison.
c. 150	Compilation of the "Book of the Kings."

²² Cf. 2 Chron. xxxiii. 11. Supp. Note on Chap. 21.²³ See Supp. Note on Chap. xxi. Rawlinson (Five Great Mon. II. 52) gives Asshur-banipal's reign 683-626, and that of his son, whom he calls Asshur-umid-ilin, 626-625.²⁴ I give here the dates of Lenormant. On the question at issue and the conflicting authorities, see p. 284 sq.²⁵ Jerem. li. 59.

Princeton University Library

32101 063611469

